The art of war, as well as of agriculture, is a question of time. To win a battle, to capture a city, to conquer a kingdom, requires not only strength and strategy, but also patience and perseverance. The right moment must be chosen, the correct actions taken, and the outcome awaited. This is the essence of war, and it is no different from the cultivation of the earth.

As for agriculture, the农民们 指出 that the key to success lies in understanding the natural rhythms of the land. They must plow the soil, sow the seeds, and wait for the harvest. Just as a farmer must be patient and persistent, a warrior must be patient and persistent as well. The battle of life is not won in a single engagement, but in a series of small victories, each one building upon the last.

In conclusion, whether in war or in peace, patience is a virtue that cannot be underestimated. It is the foundation upon which all great achievements are built.
