

This law is unusual in that it was agreed to by the mine operators as well as the State agencies responsible for supervising them, and it was passed by both houses of the Legislature without opposition.

House Bill 51 contains provisions that will enable the State Bureau of Mines to enforce good strip mining practices previously left to chance and more often ignored. It will repeal the three inadequate present laws which the Bureau administers.

It gives me a great deal of pleasure to sign this forward-looking legislation and to compliment all of the parties who were involved in its development, both from the industry and from the State.

NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT

April 19, 1967

Gentlemen of Yale:

We live in a world of images contrived by image makers and just as often controverted by the habit of history. What people think of things, institutions and each other is more pertinent to the affairs of men than truth itself, since the world is governed by ideas and feelings and seldom if ever by certain knowledge.

Let us explore this subject of image with particular attention to the image of our nation and that of the Republican Party. This is a serious and strenuous business and we can warm to our task by first considering images we know best — yours and mine.

The image of the student in America today can be disposed of with dispatch since all the world knows all about you. Plainly you are a confused and misguided lot. You burn draft cards, need haircuts and squeal on the CIA. You believe in hardly anything of enduring value and rest your case on the precepts of free love, LSD and the overriding conviction that if you can lure all of Vassar College to New Haven you will have achieved a life's work. You are known to show improper respect for parents, which is never pardonable, and little outward affection for Lyndon Johnson, which is only sometimes forgiveable. Your heroes are Mao Tse-Tung, Humphrey Bogart and Truman Capote. You play much and pray little and rarely conceal your contempt for
