

A. It hasn't been discussed with me personally as yet. Whether they have been in touch with Mr. O'Donnell about preliminary planning with regard to this, I'm not certain, but I have had no one approach me on it personally.

Q. Governor, have you taken sides in the potential Republican decision of who should run for the Senate seat, Mathias or Morton?

A. No, I haven't taken any sides because I feel assured that this matter will be resolved between the principal potential candidates themselves in the very near future. I don't think there's any real doubt in the public's mind that Mr. Morton or Mr. Mathias will become the Senatorial candidate, and that seems to be the feeling throughout the party. We expect that decision to be made between Mr. Morton and Mr. Mathias, and we'll be delighted to support either one of them.

Q. That answers my question. Aren't the thirty days about up?

A. Fairly close I would guess, and I think they're very close to making a determination.

Q. You said you would introduce Mr. Mathias as the next Senator.

A. Yes, and I would introduce Mr. Morton in Salisbury the same way.

REMARKS AT GOVERNOR'S DAY PROGRAM,
ST. MARY'S COLLEGE, ST. MARY'S CITY

October 28, 1967

Almost one hundred and fifty years have passed since Daniel Webster said: "It is a small college and yet there are those who love it." This classical remark in defense of Dartmouth College, although far removed from us in terms of time and space, could well be applied to St. Mary's College. For while Maryland takes pride in both the quantity and quality of its institutions of higher education, St. Mary's College possesses a special place and prominence among the many.

It is said that any society's character and values are captured and reflected through its institutions. Certainly, in its setting and its growth, St. Mary's College reveals and expresses much of Maryland's cherished past and promising future.

The physical location of the College itself demands recognition of our great past and proud traditions. Every acre of the campus is
