he insists, "must be loyal and reliable, but there is no reason why he must be rigidly orthodox in his thinking. There is every reason to encourage the iconoclast as well as the conformist to serve the Republic on the public payroll you taxpayers support. Whether in or out of government, the orthodox mind, because of its strength and singleness of purpose, maintains and preserves progress, but the dreamer and the non-conformist make progress. The opportunity to be different while being strictly loyal is a climate we ought to take pains to develop."

Harry Cain's brand of conservatism is thus one involving the conservation of human dignity and the protection of individual freedom.

Thus at home and abroad, Harry Cain decided — as the poet put it — in the strife of truth with falsehood, to choose the good, and avoid the evil side.

Later, Harry Cain looked southward to Miami and to another career in which his many talents could be utilized! For it was to be this move to Miami that would provide us with the basis of tonight's testimonial to him and our salute to the college which he serves as patron and friend.

It is not surprising that this conservator of human liberty should be in the vanguard of the crusade to bring new life and location to Florida Memorial College.

In associating himself with the present welfare and future of Florida Memorial College, he demonstrates further his conviction that the struggle for human dignity will be won in the last analysis through the liberating process of education.

I am sure that these present enterprises of his are most congenial to Harry Cain. Indeed, there are few things more exciting or rewarding than participating in the development of a college. For one of the most characteristic and stimulating features of American education and of American society in recent years has been the virtual tidal wave of youth washing through the corridors of higher education.

Never before and never anywhere else have so many youngsters had access to such an extended educational opportunity. And opportunity it is. The classic cliche of our time remains profoundly true: Ours is a world of such social and technological complexity that no man can be well enough educated. Therefore, for this opportunity to be a bona fide one, there must be quality and relevance in the exposure to college.
