

sure might produce salutary effects, might tend to unanimity in our deliberations, and thereby accelerate the business of the session; your discriminating these subjects from the case of Mr. Harford, and refusing to confer on them, appears to us a measure that will involve much delay, and, we fear, much contrariety of sentiment in the discussion. Had the senate been pleased to give their reasons for this discrimination, perhaps their cogency might have produced complete conviction on our minds, but as you have also omitted this, we shall at present decline any conference, except on the terms of our former message. We however cannot forbear to hope, that upon a reconsideration you will agree with us in opinion, and consent to the conference as originally proposed.
