

in 1987 (Executive Order 01.01.1987.08). The Council received its present name in June 1993.

The Council advocates that persons with developmental disabilities can live successfully outside of institutions. To this end, it secures services for such persons and their families, particularly in employment, child care, and education. The Council, for example, helps persons with developmental disabilities hold jobs by hiring job coaches to train them at the workplace. It helps day-care centers prepare to care for a disabled child. Or the Council might offer parents an advocate who will convey a child's special needs to educators. Annually, the Council funds demonstration projects that enable citizens with developmental disabilities to become independent and productive in their communities.

The Council is an independent, self-governing body funded by federal monies. It reports directly to the Administration on Developmental Disabilities, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (U.S. Code, Title 42, sec. 6024). Appointed by the Governor, Council members serve five-year terms (Council Bylaws, Art. III).
