to business, have so endeared him to all its members. These peculiarities of our President have not manifested themselves sporadically, but they have been constantly and uniformly exhibited, under all circumstances and in every contingency that has arisen. Our business has been kept "well in hand," dilatoriness on legislative action has not been tolerated, but prompt, decisive work has been fostered and encouraged. Points of order, when raised, have been decided with a firmness so tempered with gentlemanly courtesy, that they have left no cause for complaint with those who thought differently from the Chair. It is a pleasure always to bear testimony to fidelity and courtesy when enjoined with ability, and such pleasure, I am satisfied, the Senators will feel in giving an affirmative vote to the order now before us.
