unicameralism.

MR. DELIA: I think, too, you have to recognize the value of the lobbyist. The legislators, and you will find this any time you have a new election, the legislators feel that they want to read all the bills and make their own decisions, and especially in the first year of their stay in the legislature, the lobbyist can't get to them except to talk to them, but you don't sway them one way or the other; but, towards the end of the session when they find the backlog of bills or the amount of bills introduced have been so great, that they cannot read them or understand some of them, and then they start to pick out the certain lobbyists that are familiar with that particular field who they feel they can have confidence in giving them the facts they need to help make up their minds which way to vote.

So, I don't see where unicameralism is going to make any difference as far as the work of the lobbyist or the importance of the lobbyist. I think a lot of it depends on the caliber of people who are elected into the legislature, as to what their understanding might be of
