

1 forth that come about by reason of that very factual
2 change and, in order to more or less be flexible to con-
3 tend and cope with those complexities, intergovernmental
4 agreement would certainly be something that would come
5 within the scope of the actual constitutional provision
6 that we would write.

7 We do not have one in the Constitution at the 8 present time. We do have a provision for intergovern-
9 mental relations in the suggested models, but actually 10 our present Constitution is barren insofar as providing 11 for any such thing, and it seems to me that that is cer-
12 tainly one of the best ways of coping with the problem
13 and the overflowing of those problems from one munici-
14 pality into the other and county into city and actually 15 even across state boundaries.

16 So, if such an amendment has been introduced,
17 I think the analysis or the assignment of this particular 18 phase of our research should well include determining 19 what if anything has been done and is being done in the 20 Legislature along the line of governmental change and 21 administrative setup.
