constitutions in each state.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think our research, though, has got to extract from those constitutions the appropriate sections on local subdivisions and metropolitan forms of government as contemplated here, because many times you will find a constitution is so interrelated that one section will not fully cover all of the various powers that are available to the local governmental unit under one article, but they come from other articles throughout the constitution.

DR. BURDETT: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would make the suggestion, and Mr. Brooks can correct me on this, that it would be most helpful to us to deal with, to emphasize states that have had similar heritage and similar patterns with ours, and one of the states I am thinking of is North Carolina which has a high similarity in the pattern. There is a great deal of local autonomy expressed in the legislature. While I am not up to date on it, I gather there has been a great deal of change in North Carolina and a great deal of study of it at the universities.
