DR. PULLEN: The thing I'm thinking about here, if the Bill of Rights, and this involves education, if the Bill of Rights of the Federal Government and the state government were coincidental, we would probably eliminate a lot of problems we have. I see the legal reason that you cannot use the same language, because of the approach, but certainly the principle is the same. I'm just wondering if a lot of our problems would not be settled if we rewrote that, because it does affect education.

There are some general comments, I'm going to hit them briefly, and put them in the written report. The professional people in education should be protected in their jobs. Professional people on every level should have the right of discussion of their problems with the duly elected officials. That gets to be highly important. Furthermore, I think no man in public office who has any right or power of making any decision affecting education -- or rather, I'll put it this way; that every individual who holds a position of trust in
