

1 more selective than others who appear to enter only
2 those who have perhaps higher ability to learn. What 3 I'm trying to get at is whether you are suggesting that 4 the colleges could still provide a free education, but 5 within limits of the persons who could go by reason of 6 their mental capacities?

7 DR. PULLEN: I think I see your point. Let 8 us look at it this way, Mr. Eney. If the public schools
9 do not take care of them, private institutions come 10 along and do it for them. We will have this year between 11 7500 and 8,000 students paying for their education. That 12 is true of a lot of other private institutions all 13 around. Now, not all of it is because they think they 14 are getting a better education or getting this or that,
15 and so on, but somewhere along the line public schools
16 are not serving, and when I say public schools, I mean
17 colleges and universities -- let's take a university.

18 If a university wants to apply itself to 19 research and set up certain standards for that, all
20 right. Even at public expense. But, if it does so, it
21 has no right to make a distinction between two students
