The extent to which they have been able to bring institutions along to make a real contribution to the state in which they exist has to considerable extent be dependent upon the authority that they have, the way in which they continue to exercise that authority and the way in which their work has resulted in general public support of the activity.

I think it would be of interest to the group and I am sure several of you are quite familiar with the fact that the constitutions in several states do maintain provisions for the state university in the particular state. I will cite these simply in the order in which the courts have upheld the constitution autonomy, if you will; University of Michigan, Michigan State University, University of California, University of Idaho, University of Minnesota, Oklahoma State University. These are covered by specific provisions in the state constitution and the courts have pretty well upheld these as giving the opportunity for the particular boards involved to actually govern the affairs of the institution itself.