in the civil rights field, I think this is what has precipitated this question primarily, and I would like to underscore what Mr. Sykes alluded to.

I have manned the barricades of fighting for civil rights professionally, now, for twenty-five years in this State. I have no hesitation in saying that if you incorporate it in this Constitution, this proposed Constitution, provisions which I have been fighting for all these years as principles of life, if you incorporate these provisions about equality of opportunity which means, not only education, but housing, public accommodations, employment, et cetera, I'm afraid this Constitution won't pass and I think the choice that you have, it's a very practical one and it's a very real one, and I hate to put this in the record, but I think it's true, your choice is one of either continuing, those of us that are in the civil rights struggle, continuing the fight for legislation, and it will come, it is coming, but more slowly, and not jeopardize the basic document or taking a chance on jeopardizing the basic document.

I see no alternative. I would love to see
