

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19
20
21

decisions made by somebody else, and if you talk about dictatorship, to the degree of legislators, if you have one delegate from a small county and that is it, this man has the absolute, complete and sole view of that community and, if he still retains legislative control, we are in a worse system than we are now, where at least a senator can be handled by his delegates, if this did arise.

So, I am inclined to say, if we are going to have it, let's have it mandatory all the way down the line.

The metropolitan aspect; this, of course, is a very difficult question. I think as little detail should be in the Constitution as possible, because no one really knows what the evolution is going to be over the next twenty or thirty years. Yet, it seems to me, if you leave it voluntary, and any time you can get a great amount of large units to agree to something, you run into a problem. Basically, there should be a grouping with the metropolitan aspects, but with the Legislature being able to step in in certain instances. I don't know exactly how this would be worded, but you cannot go either voluntary or