It seems to me it does divide itself into those three approaches. Keeping that in mind, I would like to have Dr. Loevy give us the substance of his memorandum and then discuss it.

MR. MILES: May I make one comment, Mr. Chairman, because I would like to hear Dr. Loevy on it. As a result of reapportionment, we will have a number of counties, 23 counties in Maryland, which will have but one representative in the General Assembly. He will be a member of the House of Delegates. Considering this question, unless very broad powers are granted under the constitution, you would face a political situation and a practical situation where one man could in effect determine whether or not that county should have a charter government.

This has been brought home to me by a great many people moving around the State. They are not squealing about reapportionment although a lot are. The point they make with respect to this is that there will be quite a number of counties, nine or ten, that will have only one representative in either branch of the Legislature and
