made that the counsel to the Legislature, if there were one be a Constitutional office?

THE CHAIRMAN: I don't recall frankly. I don't think it had been thought out wough to be very definite. I don't remember right now who made the suggestion. I think Senator James was one; Mr. Mandel may have been the other. I think the comment was merely there ought to be provision for its own counsel to advise it so that it would not be bound by the opinions of the Attorney General.

JUDGE ADKINS: I might make two further comments which I did not make in my remarks, Mr. Chairman. These recommendations are neither new nor novel. They were first recommended by the Sobeloff-Stockbridge Commission in 1953 and after considerable deliberations the reports of that Commission indicate that they felt that both the Comptroller and the Attorney General should not be Constitutional officers, so we are not completely without respectable authority for the position that we have taken.

The other question is the matter was put to
