I think everything else would fall into

MR. SCANLAN: I think the 14th amendment and the equal protection clause might come into play here, If it is truly a government, then it must be representative in the constitutional sense and I think any governmental agency exercising the power of taxation would be classified by the court as a government in the true sense to which the 14th amendment would be applicable in requiring one man and one vote.

MR. BROOKS: Original government without saying it is to be representative is not inherently required to be representative. The regional governments being discussed in Detroit, the one that has been established in Toronto are not in fact representative governments and are called regional governments. They are not even based on a proportional representation but they are made up by having a delegate or two from the various proponent governments sitting together on this council which has legislative and executive responsibilities

It is not an inherent requirement they be
