Ŕĵ

comments to what Mr. Brooks has said about some of the things we learned at the Boston conference.

I came away with two very strong impressions.

One of which was a matter of considerable disappointment.

The other, if anything I suppose, was a matter of some relief.

The first was that we were able to get just no suggestions at all as to the formulation of our report or our work book or even the matter of drafting the Constitution itself. The reason we were not is a matter that all of us have been suspecting from the reading we have been doing but is definitely confirmed by the conversations with numerous people in Boston. That is that none of the other states in preparation for a Convention has undertaken to prepare the kind of report or work book that we have been talking about.

There is tremendous interest in it and among some at least an expressed feeling of skepticism that it is going to be possible for us to get such a report in less than a period of three or four years.

Real skepticism that we could possibly have a report of