is going to be difficult enough with the major changes that are being made by this group, assuming this group proposals are somewhat close to what is adopted, going to be hard enough to sell many of them to the state, without going to the state in convention which acted only with 25 or 26 per cent of its total membership or could in theory act that way.

THE CHAIRMAN: Wouldn't Mr. Case's point protect you there?

MR. ADKINS: Not necessarily because in the press of business it seems a motion to reconsider is going to be a very difficult motion to get on the floor and heard. If you adopt something and a dissident group wants a motion to reconsider, it seems to me you're inviting much more legislative entanglement or legislative or parliamentary entanglements than if you required a constitutional majority originally.

MR. MILLER: I am afraid these gentlemen aren't considering the question of time and smooth running. It might be perfectly all right to have a provision that final adoption of the constitution would
