DR. BARD: I certainly want to concur with under some State superintendent of schools, or whatever.

I see problems here, but I can see also where there could be a way for developing a system.

MR. SCANLAN: I think I agree with the two amendments that have been offered. I agree with the scepticism that Mr. Sayre has expressed, that we have enough knowledge to adopt this provision. I think we are succumbing here again to the temptation to take a worthy recognition of a present fact and stick it in the Constitution, rather than leaving it in the statute where it can be developed with the flexibility that time and events would justify. I vaguely remember some of the early constitutions of the New England States, Dartmouth College, to some extent Harvard and Brown, got themselves into all kinds of pickles by recognizing aspects of those universities in their State Constitutions. I don't see any real justification for giving the University of Maryland a constitutional monopoly at this time as the State University. I would move the whole section be deleted.

THE CHAIRMAN: Dr. Bard?
