

published the Museum alone. In the May 28 issue, he inserted an advertisement:

Wanted immediately at this office, a journeyman printer. To one who can work at case and press, constant employ and good wages will be given.

The advertisement gives no hint of Jackson's relinquishing the printing business in Baltimore. He probably continued it at least through October of that year, when he advertised Conversation Cards for sale.<sup>131</sup> But since no further trace of him is found in the city, after that date, it may be assumed that he did not carry it on much longer.

He probably went from Baltimore to Annapolis where he was associated with Frederick and Samuel Green, and later, Jonas Green, in the publication of state documents and of the Maryland Gazette. Although neither can be regarded as conclusive, there are two reasons for this assumption:

1. In 1800, a Christopher Jackson appeared in the list of subscribers from Annapolis, for the edition on the Washingtoniana published by Samuel Sower.<sup>132</sup> In 1795, Christopher Jackson of Baltimore (it may safely be assumed that it was the printer, since no other Christopher Jackson appears to have been in the city at that time) subscribed for a copy of the Works of
