

of the following booksellers: Campbell, Conrad and Co. No. 140, Market-Street, J. Rice & Co. corner of South and Market-Street, and J. Hill, No. 12, Market. This elegant work, several extracts from which have appeared in the daily prints throughout the states, and have attracted merited attention, will be delivered at 62 1/2 cents, neatly bound and lettered.

Thomas Dobbin, publisher of the Telegraphe, must have had a strong liking for this poetical work, for the next day he printed extracts in his editorial columns, under the paragraph beginring:

The Pleasures of Hope, by Thomas Campbell, which is just published in this city "as a wonderful specimen of mighty genius" irresistably attracts our attention.

Less than a week from that date, Dobbin advertised the work "for sale at the Telegraphe office."¹⁰⁴ No further trace of the book or of its publisher has come to light.
