

That about 8 o'clock at night he was removed to the lower cabin of a Steamboat at the wharf, where he was detained all night and next day, and sent to Baltimore in said steamer about 3 o'clock p. m., on Tuesday evening, and arrived there between 9 and 10 o'clock at night, and discharged about 11 at night. Deponent asked Col. Tevis what he was arrested for, and received no satisfaction, but simply the reply that he had an order for his arrest. When deponent arrived in Baltimore, no charge was made, and Col. Donn Piatt remarked that he was surprised to see so many persons, and that Col. Tevis had no authority to make any arrests till after the election.

This deponent had always been a Union man, and had never wavered in his support of the Government and his loyalty was never questioned. Prior to the arrest he had been a friend of Gen. Goldsborough and Col. Creswell, and advocated their election, and that his feelings were so ardent and warm in his advocacy of the government and opposition to the rebellion, that he has lost the patronage of several friends in his business of smithing, who thought he was too extreme in his views and support of the government. Deponent paid for one meal on board the boat; some of the other prisoners on board paid for several meals; the families of some of the gentlemen confined with deponent, sent provisions to the boat, which were used in common.
