

At Last It Has Come.

During the session of the intermediate term of court at Leonardtown on Tuesday, Judge Crane on the bench, Richard E. King, a negro hailing from Newport neighborhood, this county, was admitted to the bar as a practicing attorney. Exactly how this was accomplished we have some little curiosity to learn, and if the committee who examined King will publish a list of the questions and answers by which his qualifications as an attorney in our courts was determined they will confer a lasting obligation on all aspiring embryo legal lights. This same King, it will be remembered, applied for admission at our court some years ago, and a committee was appointed to examine him, but his answers to the simplest legal questions were so ridiculous and he evinced such a great lack not only of legal knowledge, but also of practical common sense that our recollection of the matter is that no report was ever made by the committee to the court, and Mr. (?) King "took his eggs to another market," seemingly with better success than he met here.—Port Tobacco Times.
