We give our Readers in March 1769, a Description of the Life of the late Sir John Mordaunt, Bart. written by Lieut. Colonel Mordaunt, in the Gentleman's Magazine, and published in particular a Description of the barbarous Manners of the Moorish Kings, it cannot, at this Time, be unacceptable.

THE Litchfield left Ireland in company with several other transports, under the command of Commodore Kippel, intended for Genes. The voyage was 28th, on which day, at eight o'clock, the Commodore took charge of the watch-tower, and the wind was blowing from the north-west, with much lightning, the wind veering to W. N. W. At half past nine they had full sail; Capt. Farrer came upon deck and gave orders to keep fight of the commodore, who fell the weather would permit. At the commodore bearing S. but the squalls were obliged to haul the main-top-fall, a very under their courses.

At eight, at one in the morning, says Mordaunt, the Commodore in the charge of the first lieutenant, which we took to be the commodore's right side, and W. N. W. blowing very hard. At eight I was awakened by a great shock, and a commotion on deck. I ran up, thinking some mischief, for that by my own reckoning, and the position of the ship, we were at least 35 leagues off; but before I could reach the quarter-guards a great stroke upon the ground, and the Commodore fell. Just after this, I could perceive a rumble, and uneven, about two cables length from the ship, with her broadside to windward, went over-board, carrying some men with it, and the Commodore, who was sitting in the cockpit, was killed, and the ship was in a very dangerous situation.
