would be first fatal to themselves, by their either falling a Prey to one another, or to some foreign Invader; that we should feel it next in our Trade and Manufactures; and that during whatever Administration this deplorable Event should happen, it would be but a poor Consolation to the subsequent Ministry, that the Colonies were lost to this Country by their Predecessors—As for the Act in Question, he thought a bare Refusal of it, in the ordinary Course, was treating it too mildly, and that some greater Marks of Repentment and Indignation ought to be set upon it—With much more to the same Purpose, which I am not able to recollect.—The House divided, and, by a Majority of Two to One, it was carried against presenting the Address—I forgot to mention that Lord M-----d was strongly for presenting the Address, since it had been proposed, that it might not appear on their Journals, that the House postponed, or refused to enter warmly into a Matter so essential to the very Being of the British Empire."
