rwise, should take up a Prejudice against MAC, as impious and profane, in being ludicrous upon a Subject, which Men, fanatically disposed, are apt to think too facred and awful for—a Jest.—What he has observed on the Subject of Alfanatically disposed, are apt to think too facred and awful for—a Jest.—What he has observed on the Subject of Alfanatically disposed, are apt to think too facred and awful for—a Jest.—What he has observed on the Subject of Alfanatically disposed, as well legiance, is most excellent; and I take Comfort to myself, as an American, that the great Revolution in England, as well as the Resistance of the Stamp-AC, in America, may be justly denominated Rebellion, under his most accurate and constitutional as the Resistance of the Stamp-AC, in America, may be justly denominated Rebellion, under his most accurate and constitutional

But, though I have demonstrated, that Mac never draws, but ex propris, and that the Charge of Plagiarism is merely the Suggestion of Envy; yet I can't but express my Grief, that this accomplish'd Writer, no wise diffident of his Abilities, that not "Time, or Inclination, to explore the Recesses of the British Conditution." And, as he has assured the Public, (and has not "Time, or Inclination, to explore the Recesses of the British Conditution." And, as he has assured the Public, (and who can doubt his Assurance) that "he has Possessions in America, which he will defend from Viclence and Injustice, and shewn as much Spirit as any other Man," I wish he had been pleased to define the Terms, Viclence and Injustice, and shewn us what kind of Viclence and Injustice, without swerving from our Allegiance to the ruling Power, we ought to oppose, that us what kind of Viclence and Injustice, without swerving from our Allegiance to the ruling Power, we ought to oppose, that us what kind of Viclence and Injustice, without swerving from our Allegiance to the ruling Power, we ought to oppose, that us what kind of Viclence and Injustice, without swerving from our Allegiance to the ruling Power, we ought to oppose, that us what kind of Viclence and Injustice, and she will be a Deed of great Generosity, to let us what kind of Viclence and Injustice, his Possession are, to which he apprehends no Insecurity, at a Crisis so alarming know, in what happy Region of America, his Possession are, to which he apprehends no Insecurity, at a Crisis so alarming to most other Men of Property.

To conclude—I make no Scruple in declaring, that the Esteem I have for Mac's Probity, Public Spirit, and Modesty, is equal to the Respect due to his immense Acquirements, literary and political; and, I hope no one will presume to turn to the Epigrams formed out of Æsop's Fables, and give a new Edition of the Jack-Daw, strutting in Pearly Footbard. cock's Feathers.
