THURSDAY, MARCH 20, 1777

LONDON, November 5

Extracts from the SPEECH of the duke of Manchester...

THE duke of Manchester, opened his speech with a comparison of the present state of the British empire...

His grace remarked on that passage in the speech (the assurance of amity) that he had received from the several courts of Europe...

His grace then contradicted the substantial information of the speech on another ground. He said that it was now no secret...

He said in future determined to launch it in silence, as all future efforts, he perceived, would be in vain...

of the same crisis (system of measures) which had brought us into our present perilous and tremendous situation...

HOUSE OF COMMONS, November 4. COLONEL BARRE rose, and said that he had a question to put of the first consequence...

Lord North immediately said, that their commissions had lately been published in the Gazette...

Col. Barre, pulling a paper out of his pocket, declared he had in his hand an account of what passed at the conference between gen. Washington and lieutenant-col. Patterson...

It appeared further, from the account the colonel read, that col. Patterson laid down the letter on a table; that Mr. Washington declined to accept it...

The colonel then pounced like an eagle on the tremendous part of his subject; the appearance of a war in Europe, and told the house that a war of the most serious kind threatened this country...

of France, but that he did not know how soon she might alter her intention.

This called up Lord North, who repeated what he had said in this part of the subject of his peace, and again declared, that he firmly believed the assurances of the court of Versailles...

Colonel Barre seemed not to like a refutation of the matter of fact of his assertion, and declared the ever would watch the minister...

Upon the whole, the colonel made it out, that we were by no means a match for the united force of France and Spain...

At length, having held up a most tremendous picture of impending mischief to his country, he repeated his question to the treasury bench...

Nov. 15. The empress of Russia has consented to lend his majesty 24,000 of her best troops for the service of the next campaign...
