

By these wooden sides near half of the iron is saved, the seams are closer, and the difficulty of supplying the piece of a slab of an iron side when broke, is avoided; and withal the wooden side is easier fixed. There is a yet cheaper and easier way of making the sides, effectually as it seems, though not known to me by experience. Build up with brick, laying the ends of the bricks one inch on the plate or bottom of the boiler; plaster this well and smooth with fine lime and lined on; make the oil of your flux-lead or hemp-lead, by pounding, heating, and pressing it in a coarse cloth. A bottom of brick-work or of plank would hardly stand a great fire directly under it; but the sides of brick, as above proposed, would not be so exposed.
