Directions for recovering persons, who are supposed to be dead, from drowning.

Ist. As foon as the body is taken out of the water, it must be conveyed, with care and tenderness, to a house, or any other place, where it can be laid dry and warm, avoiding the usual destructive methods of banging it by the heels, rolling it on a barrel, or placing it across a log on its belly.

zdly. The cloaths must be immediately stripped off, and the body wrapped up in blankets, well warmed. "It should be laid on its back, with the head a little raised. If the weather be cold, it should be placed near a fire; but if the weather should be warm, it will be sufficient to place it between two blankets, well heated; taking care to prevent the room from being crouded with any persons who are not necessarily employed about the body.

adly. As foon as it can possibly be done, a bellows should be applied to one nostrit, while the other nofitrif and the mouth are kept closed, and the lower end of the prominent part of the wind-pipe (or that part which is called by anatomists, Pomum Adami) as pressed backward. The bellows is to be worked in this fituation; and when the breast is swelled by is, the bellows should stop, and an assistant should press the belly upwards, to force the air out. The bellows should then be applied as before, and the Delly should again be pressed upwards; and this process should be repeated from twenty to thirty times in a minute, so as to imitate natural breathing as mearly as possible. Some volatile spirits, heated, hould be held under the valve of the bellows, while it works. If a bellows cannot be procured, some person should blow into one of the nostrils, through a pipe or quill, while the other nostril and mouth are closed as before; or if a pipe or quill be not at hand, he should blow into the mouth, while both nostrils are closed; but whenever a bellows can be procured, it should be preferred, as air forced in by this means, will be much more serviceable than air which has been already breathed.

4thly. At the same time, the whole body should be rubbed with the hand, or with hot woollen clothes. The rubbing should be moderate, but continued with industry a long time, and particularly about the breaft.

5thly. During this time, a large quantity of ashes, or falt, or fand, should be heated; and as soon as it is milk-warm, the body should be placed in it; the blowing and rubbing are then to be continued as before; and when the ashes, falt or sand, are cooled, some warmer must be added, so that the whole may be kept milk-warm.

These methods should be continued three or four hours, as in several instances they have proved successful, although no signs of life appeared until that time. When the patient is able to swallow, he should take some wine, or rum and water; bleeding or purg. ing ought not to be used, without consulting a physician, who should be called in as soon as possible.
