LONDON, July 121

Peter Burg of a letter from Peter Burg. June 10. or Though every thing has been hurry and confus fion here for several weeks past, the sleet has not yet sailed, nor is it indeed as yet ready; some of the large ships, from 70 to 80 guns, at Cronstadt, have not 500 men on board, and of those half at least are landimen, wholly unacquainted with naval affairs. The vessels on the gulf at Archangel, and other places, have been fiript for failors, who are arrived here; but even these have by no means equalled the demand for the men of war fitting out, which amounts to twenty-three fail, of which seventeen are of the line, from 66 to 100 guns, of which last there are two on board, one of which, Le Catharine, admiral (now compte) Greig has his flag. Paul Jones, by which name the American officer is known here, has not resigned his command; the majority of the British officers refuse, however, to serve under him; por has any step yet been taken to accommodate the difference. This occasions no small difficulties, though the officers have not yet left their ships: their remonstrances to the admiralty only are, that they cannot serve under the American; and that they will lay down their commissions rather than serve."

A decayed inhabitant of Fisherton, Salisbury, (defeended of an ancient and reputable family, formerly living in that city) now in the parish work-house, lately sent a letter to a gentleman bearing office in that corporation, charging himself with the commissign of a murder near Market Droyton.; about 35 years ago. The letter is very circumstantial as to sime, place, and all the horrid &c.'s of the deed; shat the writer law a youth change a guinea, followed him on the road to a bye place, knecked him down, robbed him of his money, then cut his throat, and threw the body into the briars of an adjoining hedge. He adds, that from that hour his foul has known no peace! In the blaze of day, and the darkest hour of midnight, the unhappy victim of his avarice is before his mental eyes; and he now prays that as the affizes are at hand, and the month approaches (August) when the foul deed was done, he may meet the blow of justice, and thereby expiate his crime.
