From Cheetham's Life of Paine.

MR. PATME corresponded with a lady, and dated his letters from the Carte in Aig, while the addressed her from the Little Carter of the World. For reasons which he knew that, their interconfee was suddenly fullended, and for form time he believed his fair triend in observity and differs. Many years afterwards, however, he met her unexpectedly at Paris, in the most assert circumstances and married to Sir Robert Smith. PAINE corresponded with a lady, and date!

I had incuntains of coral and gold. But a florm that I felt not, had rifen and roll'd, While wrapp'd in a flumber I lay, And when I look'd out in the morning, behold! My caffle was carried away.

It pass'd over rivers, and vallies and groves, The world, it was all in my view, I thought of my friends, of their fates, of their loves, And otten, full often, of you.

At length it came over a beautiful feene, That nature in filence had made:
The place was but fmall but 'twas fweetly ferene,
And chequer'd with funthine and thade. I gaz'd and I envied with painful good will,

I gaz'd and I envied with paintul good will,
And grew tired of my feat in the air:
When all of a fudded my caffle flood field,
As it fome attraction was there.
Like a lark from the skylit came fluttering down,
And plac'd me exactly in view.
When who fliedd I meet, in this charming re-

MR. EDITOR,

MR. EDITOR,
Thelate newspaper accounts of the intrigues of that mysterious Indian known by the titl of the Prophet of Alleghamy, brought to my found the following production. It was written some years ago, and the principal circumflances are certainly true. In the report of the New-York missionary society for 1863, there is particular mention made of the intrigues of this singular herson. Yours, &c. Yours, &c,

THE PROPHET OF THE ALLEGHANY.

In the year 1798 one of the mifficnaries to the Indians of the North-west, was on his way from the Tufcarora fettlement to the Senecas. Journeying in pious meditation through the forest, a majestic Indian darted from its recesses and arrested his progress.— His hair was somewhat changed with age, and his face marked with the deep furrows of time; out his eye expressed all the fiery vivacity of youthful passion, and his step was that of a warrior in the vigour of manhood.

"White man of the ocean, "whither wanderest thou?" said the Indian. "I am wanderest thou s" taid the Indian. "I am travelling," replied the merk disciple of peace, "towards the dwelling of the brethren, to teach them the knowledge of the only true God, and to lead them to peace and happiness." "To peace and happiness!" antwered the tall chief, while his eye flashed fire—' Behold the bleffings that fellow the footsteps of the white man; wherever he comes the nations of the woodlands fade from the eye like the mifts of morning. Once over the wide forest of the furrounding world, our people roamed in peace and freedom, nor ever dreamed of greater happines. than to hunt the beaver, the bear and the wild deer. From the farthest extensity of the great deep came the white in it armed with thunder and lightning, and deapons still more pernicious. In war he hunted us longing, lately occupied h like wild beafts; in peace he destroyed us by deadly liquors, or yet more deadly frauds.— Yet a few moons had passed away and whole nations of invincible warriors, and of hunters that fearless swept the forest and the mountain, perished vainly opposing their tri-umpliant invaders; or quietly dwindled into umpiant invades; or quietly umindictanto flaves and drunkards, and their names vithered from the earth. Retire, danged man, leave us all we yet have left, our lavage virtues and our gods; and do not in the vain attempt to cultivate a rode and barren foil cluck up the few shifty plants of patients. foil pluck up the few thrifty plants of native growth, that have furvived the follering cares

The Indians at first imagined that the white men originally I prung from the sea, and that they invaded their country because they had none of their own. They sometimes called them in their songs "the white soam of the ocean," and this name is still often applied contemptuously, by the

He preached the only true divinity, and placed before the eyes of the wondering favages the beauty of holinefs, the fufferings of the Redeemer, and the fublime glories of the christian Heaven. He allured them with the hope of everlathing bliss, and alarmed them with denunciations of an eternity of mifery and despair. The awe struck Indians, roused by these accumulated motives, many of them adopted the precepts of the mission ary fo far as they could comprehend them; and in the course of eighteen months their devotion became rational, regular, and apparently permanent.

All at once however, the little church in which the good man was wont to pen his fold, became deferted. No votary came as ofual to liften with decent reverence to the pure doctrines which they were there accultomed to hear; and only a few folitary idlers were feen of a Sunday-morning lounging about and caffing a wiftful yet fearful look at their little peaceful and now filent manfier.

The miffionary fought them out, inquired into the capie of this mysterious desertion, and told them of the bitterness of hereafter to those who having once known abandoned the religion of the only true God. The poor Indians shook their heads, and informed him that the Great Spirit was angry at their apostacy, and had fent a prophet for the fummit of the Alleghany mountain, to warn them against the admission of new docirines; that there was to be a great meeting of the old mer form, and that the prophet would there deli-ver to the people the message with which he was intrusted. The zeasous missionary determined to be prefent, and to confront the impostor who was known by the appellation of the Prophet of the Alleghany. He accordingly obtained permission from the chais in appear at the council, and to reply to the charges that might be brought forward. The 12th day of June 1802, was the time fixed for the decision of this solemn question, whether the belief of their forefathers, or that of the white men was the true religion?" The usual council house not being large enough to contain fo great an offenblage of people, they met in a valley a-bout eight miles to the westward of the Seneca Lake. This valley was then embower, ed under lofty trees; it is furrounded on almost every side with high rugged hills, and through it meanders a small river.

It was a scene to call forth every energy of the human heart. On a smooth level, near the bank of the flow ftream, under the flinde of a large elm, fat the chief men of the tribes. Around the circle which they for med, was gathered a croud of wondering favages, with eager looks, feeming to demand the true God at the hands of their wife men. In the middle of the circle fat the aged and travel worn missionary. A few gray hairs wander-d over his brow, his hands were croffed on his bosom, and as he cast his hope beaming eye to Heaven, he feemed to be calling with pious fervour upon the God of truth to vindicate his own eternal by the mouth of his fervant.
