THE CHRISTIAN.

The glory of God thould be the end of all our actions, not only in our most essential duties but in our intercourse with men. As God has called us from nothing into existence, and impressed upon us his own image, we cannot, without extreme ingratitude and difobedience, neglect to glorify him in our co-dies and spirits, which are his. This reli-gious tendency of the foul to God, as the supreme lord and the object of our most ardent defire, gives to our actions an excellence above what they otherwise would enjoy. Thus moral duties towards men when they are directed to God, become Divine .- Acts of charity are so many facred oblations to the Deity. Men are but the altars upon which we lay our presents—God receives them, as if immediately offered to his Divine Majesty and confumed to his honour. After living a life of faith and obedience in the fervice of the Most High God, what exquisite delight will it be to receive the welcome approbation of our bleffed Redeemer, Well done thou good and faithful Servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord. The anticipation of this enjoy ment contributes to our happiness here, and is an additional inducement to every ferious and reflecting mind, to make all our thoughts and actions tend to the glory of God and the faivation of our fouls. To be rewarded according to the ways of the world for fervices rendered to others, is what labour has a right to demand for its exertions; but to be made happy for ever; to be rewarded for festing ourselves; for promoting our best interests. our own everlasting weltare, can no where be found but in the abundance of our Redeem-

" Well done thou good and faithful servant What welcome language to the humble Chris tian! Conscious of impersection, and feeling no title through his own merits to the D. vine Favour, how transporting to him, to be met upon the confines of the eternal world, when his pilgrimage on earth is closed, with that fentence of approbation—" Well done good and taithful fervant"—uttered too from the lips of him, whose judgment is irreversi If language fails in describing this exalted, this fublime pleasure, surely it is an object now to ascertain, whether we possess those marks, which prove us faithful to our Lord. It is a question that we may put to ourselves in every walk and circumstance of life, "Am I a faithful servant!" Do I use the talents, with which I am intrusted, for the glory of him, who is their rightful proprietor; and with reference to that folemn day, in which he will demand my account of them? What man on earth is not interested in this trying question? Who, that possesses not some talent from the bountiful God, which he may improve for his own or neighbour's good, and for the glory of the Giver

" Our master is not a hard one. He does not expect to reap where he has not fown; but furely it is reasonable, that if he has fowed plenteously, he should expect to teap plenteoufly.

will lift an inquiring eye to the " Father of lights," and submit to divine inspection the fruits of his labour before he offers them tworld. He will ask; is this the true use of my mental faculties? will this be for the ho-nour of Him, whole "inspiration gave me understanding?"

"The DIVINE will ask his heart before very action, Is this confount with my high and holy vocation? Is this becoming the character of one who has taken upon himself the truft " of a shepherd of fouls ?"

" The PHYSICIAN will ask, that his talents may not only be exercised for the tem-poral, but for the spiri ual good of his friends. He will wish above all things, to heal the disorders of his own soul. He will ask that he may be consumed in the principles of religion by observing the wonderful powers and organization of that fystem, which he is called to relieve and invigorate. He will defire to look through the material body to the spirit which animates it. He will inquire the cause of its manifold disorders, and the ing "death" to be the "wages of sin," will then be imperceptibly drawn to look & to will then be imperceptibly drawn to look & to fly unto Jusus, the conqueror of death, and despoiler of the grave. Seeing much of the infirmities of the body, and the consequent unhappines of the present life, he will naturally extend his thoughts beyond it, and contemplate with joy and delight that unmixed state of selicity above, where sin and death have no place; where the inhabitants shall not say, "I am sick," and where tears shall cease forever. shall cease forever.

"The MERCHANT, though engaged in the active pursuits of business, yet, feeling that the gain of the whole world would be mischable recompence for the loss of his foul, ponders upon his plans of profit and asks if they trespals not upon his neighbour's rights, if they interfere not with the demands of religion, if they rob him not of an unreafonable portion of his time, or do not engross too much of his attention, and finally, if he can retain his character of a " faithful fervant of his Lord. If his conscience canno promptly fatisfy him in these inquiries, his determination is fixed, to relinquish his designs. His ambition is to lead a uleful life, to exhibit a fair and bright example of a man, enpaged in active, extensive business, fill having his fift, best thoughts on HIM, who made and preserves him; by whose smile he prospers; and on whose blessing he depends; consecrating to him his earnings, and refigning himfelf to his disposal, anxious only to secure the "pearl of great price," the savour of his

He administers, dily wants of his neighbours, yet to their spiritual necessities .- He endeavours in the chamber of fickness, and in the hour of dissolution, to approve himself faithful to his Lord by pointing to the Lamb of God who taketh away the fin of the world; and entreating all about him to lay hold, while it is yet offered, on the hope of that glorious Gospel, which is all that can afford rational happiness in lif., fortitude, peace, and comfort in

We are all hastening to one common end. On this fide and the other the young, the gay, the vigorous, and the aged, are crumb-ling into dust. How often do we witness their departure, follow them to the narrow humble habitation of the grave, and enter a-gain upon the business and the vanities of life, seldom realizing for one single moment, that we also must soon occupy the same mansion. Would it not be wife to make DEATH a friend ?

Our bleffed Lord, just before he uttered the parable, which gave rife to our motto, left, in one word, to all his followers, this most useful important-solemn lesson-" WATCH." The faithful servant, attentive to this injunction, will never fear the coming of his master; his talent has not been concealed, knowing the goodness of his Lord, he he has used it in dependence upon his bleffing To account for it, he is always ready, and as he habitually acts with reference to the day of reckoning, it can never arrelt him unpre-pared. Be this our posture. Be this the resent, constant concern of our minds, to be found vigilant and faithful, waiting for the coming of our Lord."
