The name of general Heath, Massachusetts, is familiat to all who are acquainted with the history of the American revolution, in which that venerable hero bore so conspicuous a part. At that day general Heath entered into the service of his country, as a whig and a repub-Mcan-nor did he sheathe his sword till peace and independence rewarded his toils and dangers, and those of his compatriots in arms. Since the revolution, his political principles and attachments have been uniformly republican. Mr. Jefferson's administration had not a firmer supporter than gen. Heath. But since the accession of Mr. Madison, and since the influence of bad men has become paramount at Washing ton, gen. Heath, like many other bonest and independent republicans, has not only withdrawn his support, but has deemed it an indispensable duty to oppose decidedly the baleful system of the present cabinet. He accordingly permitted his name to he run on the Clintonian ticket of setts. We have authority to say, that the following letter is from general Heath, of Roxbury, the revolutionary patriot of '75, and ever since, the firm and consistent friend of American Independence, in answer to one from the Hon. "You say my friends feel mortified, in seeing my name on the federal ticket, for electors .- The ticket on which my name was placed was supported by many of the firmest republicans, I know if length of time and undeviating conduct, are admitted in evidence. Considerate men, of both parties are agreed, that the violence of party spirit, threatens our country with ruin, and that a union must be effected. You as well as myself, have asserted, that a large portion of those called federalists, are as much attached to the welfare of our country, and the genuine principles of republicanism as we are. How important, then, to unite the honest and well meaning of both parties. That is now the object and parties. I hat is now the object and it will succeed. Heretofore the republicans have not held out the hand of an union to the federalists; and when honest federalists have sincerely made an attempt to do it, oversheated party men, have exclaimed, that it was it a federal ticket."
