From the Gleaner. THE COGITATIONS OF UNCLE JOHN.

Are you at leisure, my friends ? Come go with me to the rock on yonder mountain, and let us take a survey of the works of nature. Behold the setting sun. How glorious are his beams. Look abroad through the valley. How green are the pastures-How fragrant are the meads. See the fields of grain ripeling for the sickle, and mark how majestically yonder river. moves to the ocean. Hark! Do you hear the feathered songsters of the grove chaunt their vespers to their Maker's praise? Surely this is a delightful place.

But lo! the moon that rules the night, ascends the eastern sky, and the heavens are hung with innume. rable stars. How splendid! How delightful! But amidst the wonder and delight of this sublime view, the mind is impressed with a so-1emb awe, and the soul enquires,

Who hath made these fields, and arrayed them in the rich and fragrant vesture athat clothes them ! Who hath given music to the songsters on the valley? What hand hach fixed those, glorious light in the heavens? And Ot by whose power doth the splendid orb of day pour forth his flood of light and life upon creation !

While we deeply deplore the wickedness, and consequent wretch, edness that prevails in the land, the philanthropic mind is led to choose what can be done to arrest ts progress?

There is an evil-a master, vicethe prolific mother of a thousand wors the perential spring of houndless misery, prevailing in the land, which can only be artested by the firm, persevering efforts of the wise and good.

That vice is INTEMPERANCE It prevails to an unbounded extent, infecting all classes of the equiminity, from the humble cotits train moral depravity, disease and death.

By the influence of this dreadful contaminating vice, the noble mind of man, that places, him first in the sphere of created beings and assimilates him to the image of his Divine Maker, is dethroned. His immortal soul is degraded and prostrated in the dust, and he sinks below the heart's that perish.

The habit of intoxication, like most other vices, is of slow and siient growth. A bitter in the morn-A glass of coul grog at 11 A little brandy to settle the dinner, and a cup with a friend in the evening, often repeated, renders the practice inveterate. Liquor be-comes a tyrant. The noblest mind sinks into the degraded, resistless slave of appetite and indulgence .-And then-happy if the victim of vice does not tread last on the heels of folly, and crimes foul and unseemly, blast the reputation of the man, who, but for intemperance, might have proved an ornament to society, an a pattern to husbands, fathers and friends.

Go to the abodes of indigence and wretchedness, and ask the cause of their misery? The an swer, ten times in eleven, will be INTEMPERANCE entered our dwelfing and happiness and plenty fled. Enquire the source of domestic infelicity? Ask the pale wife why she weeps in secret? Ask, at the These are the works of thy Al. iron gratings of your prisons, for mighty hand.
