FOREIGN.

From a London paper. Murat—The following curious history is circulated in Paris, under the title of "The Catastrophe Murat." It is from the pen of M. Beauchamp.

Of the five or six Kings who Bonaparte had established in Europe, none seemed so secure as Joachim Murat. All the rest were kicked down, but the latter still firm upon his usurped throne, and had his Ambassadors, or at least his intriguers, in all the Courts of Europe. His armies, more formidable than ever, occupied one hundred leagues of territory beyond the frontiers of the fine kingdom of Naples. The Congress destined to fix the definitive fate of Europe sent him Plenipotentiaries, and proposed to enlarge his kingdom with part of the States of the Church; his moderation was invited, and he was invited how singular it may appear, to join the league of the Legislative States, armed against usurpation, and yet he disdainfully sent the Plenipotentiaries, and would listen to nothing, so certain was of his circumstances.

All this passed in the early of April, and by the end of Italy was rid of Murat. The Tacticians will read with admiration the marches and defeats in forty days drove Murat and his army from the banks of the Tiber to the gates of Capua. From there he fled at full gallop, and there met the denouement of his adventures. He arrived on the 17th of May at sun-set, at full gallop, attended by four horsemen only. He presented himself to his wife pale and ghastly; "dame—I could not die!" were his last words which he spoke to King. Terror pervaded the city. The querors refused to include him in the capitulation by which the kingdom was to be re-erected.

Next day Murat cut off his hair which he used to keep curled, and put on a grey without any decoration. T. guided, he secretly gained the coast, whence a small bark him over to the island of Ischia, there he embarked on board a chaut vessel, which waited
