From a London paper. Murat-The following curious history is circulated in Paris, under the title of "The Catastrophe of Murat." It is from the pen of Mr. fleet and arsenal. Beauchamp.

even Bonaparte himself had been kicked down, but the laster still s firm upon his usurped throne, and able than ever, occupied one hundred leagues of territory beyond the IV. frontiers of the fine kingdom of Naples. The Congress destined to fix the deficitive fate of jurope, sent him Plenipotentiaries It was proposed to enlarge his kingdom with part of the States of the Church; his moderation was invoked, and he was invited however singular it may appear, to join the league of the Legislative Sovereigns, armed against usurpation; and yet he disdainfully sent back the Plenipotentiaries, and would listen to nothing, so certain was ne of his circumstances.

All this passed in the early part of April, and by the end of May, Italy was rid of Murat. Never was there a rall so great or so rapid. res, the marches and defeats which in forty days drove Murat and his army from the banks of the Po to the gates of Capua. From Capua to Naples he fled at full gallor, and there met the denouement of his adventures. He arrived on the 17th of May at sun-set, at full gallop, attended by four horsemen conly. He presented himself before his wife pale and ghastly; " Madame-I could not die"-were the last words which he spoke as a King. By these means, Caroline Bonaparte had time and opportunity to embark with her plate, jewels, ready money, valuable furniture, and 150 domestics. Her departure was the signal to the populace of Naples for a general state of uproar, which the allies were obliged to quell.

The legitimate Sovereign mounted his throne and the Ex Queen saw from the deck of the ship, which was still in the Bay of Na ples, the fen de joie which signalized the downfall of her tyranny. Com. Campbell was about to sail for Antibes, when his voyage was suddenly suspended. The Austrian General demanded Madame Murat as his prisoner. She was obliged to capitulate once more, and sail ishment the recital of the manœuv-res, the marches and defeats which Gratz in Styria.

The gold and diamonds left her in virtue of her capitulation with the English, are valued at 18 million of francs, but the diamonds and precious effects have been formally demanded by the courts of Spain and Naples, as Crown jewels.

As to Murat himself, he landed at Cannes, on the very spot which was marked by the foot of his brother-in-law a few weeks before. His present place of retirement is entirely unknown, but it is underquerors refused to include Murat stood that he is soliciting the protection of the Austrian government modern opinions on politics; lecand permission to join his wife and
