HUNTING SONG. From Lloyd's Arcadia,
WHEN the morning peops forth, and the sephyr's cool gale.

Carries fragrance and health over mountain and dale;

Up, younymphs, and ye swains, and to gether we'll rove.
Up hill, down the valley, by thicket

Then follow with me, where the welkin resounds

With the notes of the horns, and the Let the wretched be slaves to ambition and wealth;

All the blessing we ask, is the blessing of health. So shall innocence self give & warrant

No envy disturbs, no dependence dethen follow with me, where, &c &c. O'er hill, dale and woodland, with rapture we roam; Yet returning, still find the dear plea-where the cheerful good humour gives honosty grace, And the heart speaks content in the smiles of the face.

Then follow with me, where, &c. &c.

MONITORIAL.

From the Merrimack Intelligencer. It is owing to a constitutional weakness in the human mind, that men hesitate not to perform an action which they know to be wrong; and although they may boldly avow the action, they strive to conceal the mative even from themselves. They will endeavour to shut out thought whenever it strays towards their own frailties, and contrive, by the aid of f rgetiulness, to patch up their consciences, and make their peace with themselves.

Every person's conscience teach es him to prefer good to evil; and no man is so bad, but this silent monitor often endeavours to recover and maintain his authority over him. With those of strong intellectual faculties it generally succeeds; but it is weak minds that neglect its dictates, and plunge into error. To this inability to condemn and forsake practices which are dear to us, but the tendency of which we know to be may be ascribed the prevalence of vice in Youth, sanguine and unsuspicious, when the pleasures of the world first open on their view, see nothing but happiness before them. They enter the circle of gaiety and pleasure, without entertaining one thought of the pain, that too surely follows in their train .- They proceed-no sooner do they give way to one temptation than another succeeds; at first, they make a feeble resistance-a sense of right flits across their minds; but they do not allow it to stay-reflection is treated as an enemy, and forced to become a stranger. How many men, who might have been ornaments to society, are plunged into the vortex of guilt, and finally lose their immortal souls, by rejecting the sober dictates of reason, and following in its cad the impulse of the moment, the blind dictates of their passion increasires.

Those who give up the reins to vice, although they frequently reflect on the awful consequence of their conduct, yet the same irresolution, the same weakness, that first induced them to leave the path of rectitude, continues them in the same course, till they finally become infamous outcasts from socie-

Without a systematick regularity of habits, it is almost impossible to preserve morality-and a proper observance of the Sabbath is one of the most prominent alds to virtue, and is the most salutary in its effects on man, whatever his situation in life. It has been remarked that there appears to be a spirit of licentiousness, in a state of constant progression, of late years. The house of God is deserted—while pleasure and business occupy multitudes on the sacred day, when they should be attende g the worship of their Creator. The effects of this prevailing evil shew themselves in a thousand different ways. Children, taught by the example of their parents to seek their own pleasure or profit on the Sabbath ornd their time in roving about the fields, or otherwise, in pursuit of enjoyment. What is the consequence? They grow up without the fear of the Lord-their morals are loose, and even, their ideas of morality are vague and undefined; they become pests of society, and almost invaribly spend their lives either inscenes of dissipution or iniquity, and at length leave the world unregretted and unwent. But how opposite to this is the character of those who are brought up in the habit of spell ding their Sabbaths in the worship of their God, and in the cultivation of the principles of Christiadity. How placeful, and how pleasant, do their hours pass ! Alter apending the week amidst the bustle of the world, how joyfully does the good man lead his family to the nouse of instruction, where religion and virtue are taught them and where he can retire within him self, and contemplate the goodness of that Being, who supports him in all his trials, and who holds out such rich rewards to those who persevere to the end in good works. The act of absenting ourselves from the house of worship, an frivolous pretences, is the most dangerous and the most riminal of habits, its consequences are more deeply felt in society, and are more lasting, than any other neglent of which we can be guilty.

Young men, take the advice, I gray you, of one hastening towards the grave Let no pretence whatever induce you to neglect your Creator. The pleasures of this world are of short duration-they will soon pass away. But you have an interest to gain in the world to come. Delay not, though to you the time of your dissolution appears afar off, to make your calling and election sure.
