Derimoor Prisons.
His Royal Highness chas commaded me to express, through you, to the government of America, how deeply he laments the consequences et this unhappy affair.

If any thing can tend to relieve te distress which his Royal Highset feels on this occasion, it is the consideration, that the conduct of me soldiers was not actuated by any girt of animosity towards the priwaers, and that the inactivity of the endre may be attributed rather to the inexperience of milicia forces, than to any want of zeal or inclinanon to afford that liberal protection which is ever due to prisoners d war. But his Royal Highness has obgerred, at the same time, with sinette regret, that although the firing of the troops upon the prisoners my have been justified, at its commentement, by the turbulent con-lect of the latter, yet that the extest of the calamity must be ascrib ed to a want of steadiness in the troops, and of exertion in the offiers, calling for the most severe animedversion. His Royal Highness has hers pleased to direct the comman-der in chief to address to the commanding officer of the Somerset mihtis his disapprobation of the con deet of the troops, which it is trusted will make a due impression on the minds of the officers and men who were engaged in this -unfortu-

As an additional proof of the seniments which animate the prince regent on this occasion, I am further commanded to express his royal highness's desire to make a compensation to the widows and famies of the sufferers : and I have to request that you, gentlemen, would mike this known to your government, inviting them at the same time, to to-operate with his majesty's charge d'affairs in the U. CURIOUS AND UNIQUE JEWISH MA-NUSCRIPT.

The literati are likely to be highly interested with an original, ancient and complete manuscript of the Pentateuch, now in possession of Mr. Joseph Sums, of Darlington, Durham.

This original copy is of leather; is in two volumes, about two feet ride, and measures 169 feet long, It is supposed of goat skin leather. and is most excellently, dressed, so as to have an exquisite softness to the touch. Each sheet of skin is divided into pages, five inches and a half width. The letters very arge, and not only most excellently written, but ornamented with a number of Tagin or Coronac, which is a thing peculiar to the most ancient manuscripts. Each sheet of leather is stitched very neatly to the others with a kind of substance in appearance not unlike

The antiquity of this manuscript may be inferred by its being written on leather, a circumstance which would hardly have taken place after the invention of vellum was made. It was recently procured from the continent under the most interesting circumstances. It is believed to be from 14 to 1500 years old; & in any case is the oldest copy of the law extant. There is reason to believe it has been above 800 years in one family, son the conti-nent. It is well known to what degree the Jews venerate their sacred books, and with what care they preerve them; it will, therefore, be selieved, that nothing but the most afflicting and inperious circumstances could induce a family loving heir law, to part with a treasure so precious. During the calamities which followed the train of Buonaparte's wars, a Jewish family, of opuence, was reduced to utter ruin, & compelled to emigrate. They came to Holland in their exile, & were so reduced as to be obliged to pledge, as the last remaining resource, this manuscript of their law, under a limitation of a considerable time for its redemption. The the expired, the piedge was not redefined, and the property was sold in Holland. by the person who lent his money on it. This most valuable and antique performance is now likely to be a public benefit. It has been preserved with the greatest care, in a rich cover fringed with a fine silk and lined. The rollers, on which the manuscript runs, are beautiful mahogany or iron wood. It has been seen by a number of Hebrew scholars and a literary enthusiasm, and the latter treating it with the most solemn reverence. It has been collated by a very learned man, and its readings preferred to the most ancient coples we have; so that this may justly be thought to be unique, as well as the most ancient copy of the file books of Moses in existence.

.These facts naturally give birth to a few reflections. Is not such a manuscript a national object? Ought it not to be purchased for the British Museum or the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge? There are many noblemen and literati, who would not scrupls the most generous price; and for a generous price only its present possessor aught to be induced to part with it. The writer of this article having seen it, thinks that he may hazard an opinion, that its least value must be 2,-600 guineas. Surely such a national, object ought not to be in any private hands whatever; but either the universities, or some other public Body, should purchase and place it, Where, under regular superintendance, is may be occasionally open to the learned, and to those who are curious for the accurate knowledge of all that pertains to the records of that wonderful people, the ancient Israelites.

The trunk was af-terwards found is the college yard and the bills of exchange therein—but the bank notes gone. Suspicion lighted upon a stranger, from Philadelphia, who had been a day or two in Prince-tone probably awaiting for the oppor-tunity of committing this theft. On the afternoon of the 18th a person wet and cold and hungry, called at the house of William Pearson, Eaq. about 4 miles from this place, and begged the 4 miles from this place, and begged the liberty of warming himself & for some victuals Mr. Pearson having heard of the robbery, and a description of the supposed thief, immediately suspected him, and while eating the victuals set for him, procured the assistance of a constable and secured him. He was searched but no money found upon him; yet such was the strength of the suspicion created by the description of his person and dress that he was taken to Princeton, and proved to be the sus-pected person. He stoutly denied the charge-but the circumstances of his being there upon no visible businesshis sleeping in the room where the rob bery was committed, his unaccounted for departure during the night, and the extraordinary condition he was in when
