From a late English Paper. EXTRAORDINARY ESCAPE. On Sunday evening week Mr. J. Auburn, (N. Y.) April 27. · SUICIDE.

A melancholy and extraordinary case of suicide occurred last week in the town of Scipio, in this county. Mr. Ephraim Allen, the subject of the awful perpetration, was in the prime of life, in easy circumstances, and bore a good reputation. He effected his purpose by fastening to a beam in his barn, a halter which he had taken from a horse, and in the noose of which fixing his neck, and so rested his knees upon the floor that the partial weight of his body would strangle him. The rope was but 5 feet from the floor and he was 0 feet high. In this situation he was found, only a few imputes after he had left his friends in the house with a smile, calm and placid in his countenance, that betokened reason & tranquility to be reigning in his breast. Mr Allen was in an active service during the late war, suffering with manly fortitude privation and peril Bearce three weeks previous to the dreadful commission, he entered joyfully into the holy state of matrimony, and no circumstance is known to have occurred to mar his pleasure in the society of his partner; and all the evidence given in the case concurs in establishing the fact, that he was at the time to appearance, and had been for several weeks, perfectly sane and unruffled in his temper. What strange infatuaworks in the breast of man, to force him untimely (because forbidden and unblest) to rush into the presence of his Maker?

Died, in this city on Thursday evening last, bled, in this city on I hursday evening last, the 3ch year of his age after several bays indisposition, Mr. William H. > From the Federal Republican. HON. SAMUEL DEXTER.

We received by the mail of yesterday, the melancholy intelligence of the death of the Hon. Samuel Deater, the democratic candidate for the office of Governor of Massachusetts .- The sud den departure of a man who "filed so large a share in his country's eye," is calculated to admonish us, how comparatively triffing are the honours of this world, when set in opposition to that awful change that awaits us in the midst of this turbulent career. He is now removed from the dusty region of political contest, alike insensible to censure, or to panegyric.

The eloquence of this eminent orator possessed a native and to us an irresist. able charm. It was an eloquence modelled on the subject which he had undertaken to illustrate, explain, or to en-

Where cool, dispassionate and duminous argument was required, the orator was cool dispassionate and luminous. He arrested attention in the first place by his calm and collected manner, and having once taken us captive by his powerful spelis, he led us through all the intricate mazes of his argument, with so familiar a hand, that he seemed rather to follow us, than to be the guide of our foot steps: whenever path os was required, our bosoms were taken by storm, before we were apprized of the assault. Recovering from this powerful shock, we found ourselves accompanying this enchanter on the plain even ground of argument again, who seemed to be utterly unconscious of the might which he had so recently put forth, or more properly to persuade us that he himself had no agency in all this transaction. He made his audience believe while he chained them to their seats, that he was no orator; that it was not the orator but the client who was telling "a plain and an unvarnish ed tale." While we saw and felt, and breathed the atmosphere of his genius; we were insensible of it, but by the effects which it wrought upon our senses. He displayed no unmatural sarmth; there was no rising above, or falling below the subject; no turbulent violence of manner. He enchained our reasoning faculties in the first instance, and then with those powerful auxiliaries he approached the heart that seemed when so assaulted, to surrender at discreiton.

guard against the sythic wiles of his fintagonit, and Mr. Dexter rugs in re-ply, under all the district a way which piy, under all the disidvants as which those suspicions excited. He agan by informing the jury that he had no practice to the control of the land to plain man, incapable even if he had the wish to impose on their judgments, and the apparent sincerity and simplicity of his manner was the apparent of the investment of won the confidence of the jury. After this preparatory lodgment was inade in their feelings the will orator, poured all the strength of his mind through the subtle channel, and the arguments, the eluquence and the case of his opponent were gone, before the jury were sensible of the change themselves. Every man of the jury rose from his seat with a firm conviction that Dexter was not an orator, for he had the consummate art to persuade them that he was not, and they discredited, atterly discredited, the evidence of their own senses. He never snatched a verdict from the hands of the jury; it was tendered to his acceptance. Another prominent point in his eloquence was, that he ould either adopt a close, or wide range of argument, as suited his purpose. If a precedent was favourable to the cause of his client, it possessed a sort of sanctity not to be approached without ave; it was the safe guard of property and of right, and the jury were warned not to touch the consecrated landmark. If the precedent was unfavourable, then the reason of the thing came in play; general principles were urged with all the force of his eloquence, to which this solitary precedent was hostile, this strain on the escutcheon of justice, which the jury were implored to wipe away. The mind of Dexter never staggered under a mass of unwieldly and cumberous metaphors: if illustration was required-the metaphor arose suddenly, sparkled upon us and vanished.—There was no exhibition of the brilliant in different lights -the Orator caught the beam that flashed direct upon the subject; and while we gazed, the lustre was gone. His sarcasms were full to the point, compendious and terrible: the wound was reeking before we saw the glittering of
