

only the edge of the whirlwind struck the edge of his dwelling-house; his wife ran out of it with her child in her arms; the storm bore her along the distance of 40 or 50 yards, snatched the child out of her arms, and carried it some yards from her—it escaped unhurt. After passing the house, the whirlwind struck the negro quarters, which it blew down; four negroes, who were in them, were considerably hurt; three of them were put out of their senses, "as if the power of the wind had totally bereaved them of their senses"; fifth less fortunate even than his companions, was carried about 150 or 200 yards, his skull smashed against the ground, and he died next day.

Mr. H. heard of no other traces of the tornado, until it struck the plantation of the widow of Mr. John Turner; there it seemed to tear every thing to pieces; but he did not learn of any injury being done to the people.

The next accounts he had of it, was at major Fox's, on the river; here it did considerable damage—destroying most of his small grain. On Saturday morning, Mr. Hughes was informed that on the other side of the river, it had killed a white man, destroyed most of the small grain he went, twisted off the rye heads as if had been done by the human hand.

He was informed, that about a mile from the river, the whirl seemed to rise from the earth, until it had travelled for the space of a mile and an half, when it descended and struck with more violence than before. This is the last account he heard of it.

We learn from other sources, that its violence was astonishing, and the damage done to trees and other high objects, which the narrow vein of 2 or 500 yards through which it traversed, was considerable.
