From the Eastern Argus. The following account of the murder of Miss Pattan, will doubtless be read with some interest. The particulars of this melancholy occurrence are given in a letter from a young gentleman in Georgia. where the circumstance took place, to his friend in Boston, dated Fay ette, Aug. 4, of which the following is a copy:

"Dear sir-It unhappily falls to my lot to inform you of an event inconceivably tragic! a melancholy gloom pervades the whole of our little village. When you was with us the last winter, I think you must have become acquainted with the beautiful Miss Pattan, who has ever been justly esteemed the highest ornament of our fair. She was the only daughter of col. Pattan, a gentleman of the first respectability of this village. The particulars of the tragical event are as follows:

About two years since, the unfortunate young lady became acquainted with a youth or respectable parentage, by the name of Spooner, who at that time sustained an unblemished character. Young Spooner, who soon after his first introduction became constant in his visits, exhibited that partiality for Miss P. indicative of unfeigned affection, and which she apparently acknowledged with reciprocal ardor-their parents too, at this period, so far from disapprov ing of the mutual attachment of happy couple, seemed anxious for the arrival of the day, when by their union in marriage, the two families would also become happily con ected. But alas, how unstable are the things of this live! How prone are we to disappointment! Adversity unexpectedly marked one of this fond pair as her own! Young Spooner, who until now, had been esteemed as a young gentleman of unexceptionable character, suddenly became a votary to dissipation; in vain were the entreaties of his fond parents, his fair Maria; in vain the attempts of a large circle of friends and acquaintance, to effect a reformation. He yet continued to visit the house of col. P. but it being now, too apparent that the tippling and gampling house was his most favorite resort, the colonel conceived it an indispensable duty to deny him this privilege; his doors were closed against him, and all further communication between his daughter and the 'now dissipated Spooner, strictly forbidden.

The unfortunate Maria, whose teal attachment for young Spooner was too apparent to be doubted, with reluctance yielded to the indispensable commands of a tender parent-she could not in a moment cease to feel an affection for the youth with whom she had spent so many happy hours: but to become now his wife, she was too sensible would not only be acting in opposi tion to the best edvice of ber friends, but would serve only co complication of miseries The neglest with which young Spooner was not created not only by his falcing and and her connexions, but my shore who were late intimato associates, had in genten enette abbatent-

Although not privileged to visit or exchange a syllable with Miss P. it was evident that the rash youth was of the foolish opinion that she would never consent to become the wife of any other person but himselfi to her person he made public proclamation of his right, as he had not only gained her own assent to a union, but that of her nearest

In this state affairs remained, and without any prospect of a reformation in Spooner, until about four months since, when he gained in formation that his Maria had received the addresses of a new admirer, to whom she had engaged herself in marriage, and that a onsummation of the marriage nuptials were shortly to take place.

The unfortunite Spooner from this moment became like one entirely lost to all sense of shame, and bent on mischief of the most serious nature. The uncortunate vainly flattered-himself as unwilling to form a connection with any other, received also a share of the opprobrious epithets with which he reproached her friends. "Never. (did he publicly swear) shall the ungrateful pre-engaged Maria, become the wife of any other person, than myself, if life is spared to prevent it." Alss, although the vile oaths and imprecations of the rash young man were then regarded as only the fruits of intoxication, yet, sad to relate, he has since reazed them by a deed of dreadful note. Having, by means unknown, a few days since obtained information that the marriage ceremo y was the evening following to be performed between Miss P. and ner new suitor (a young gentleman from Maryland) the vile murderer, it appears, began to devise a plan and to furnish himself with such weepons as would enable him to effect his heliish design: secretly obtaining a brace of large horse pistols and a clasp knife, the former he charged with a ball and slug each; thus armed and instigated by the devil, he, on the evening of the 29th ult. repaired to the house of Col. P. for the unfortunate Maria, where (as appears by his own confession) after having skulked about the house for some time, seeking an pportunity to destroy the innocent and unsuspecting victim, and beoming stift more exasperated at a view of her through the window, scated in a convivial mood beside her lover, his disposition would no longer p rmit him to postpone a deed, which the deceptive arts of heil (if I may be allowed the expression), were prompting him to pression, were prompting him to execute. On entering the piazza, he hand, he with a cock'd pistol in his hand, he tapped at the floor, which, unfortunately, being opened by the ever to he lamentett Maria, she instantaneously received in her left side the contents of the fatal weapon, and fell lifeless upon the floor.

The vile assassin, conscious of his guilt, and probably of the atonement which justice would demand tor an act so barbarous, attempted to escape his just reward by plung' ing the knife into his own bosom; but, although he gave himself two severe wounds, I am informed by the surgeons who attended him, that they are not such as will prove mortal.
