IN THE KNOWN WORLD,

And declare, that we will shave, cut, curl and weave hair, at our Grand Lodge, bearing the sign of the Golden Eagle, two doors above the post-office and one below Mr. Baldwin's tavern, in a style far BETTER than any one of our order on the terraqueous globe, not excepting the polished friscur of the Ex-emperor Napoleon, or the spruce whisker curler of the Prince Regent, both of whom may hobble with tolerable decency through the duties of their respective offices, but have never, by that application and study which is necessary to qualify a man for the exalted station which we claim, plunged into all the mysterics and beauties which belong to our most honourable profession. This however may be ascribed to an indifference to their fellow-creatures good; the sole object, we must aver, which urged us to the attainment of that perfection of which we now boast.

We consider it superfluous to enter into a farther detail of our superior skill, as all who are acquainted with our former celebrity will readily acknowledge, "That the shop was our field of fame, and wigs our first delight."
