

endeavoured to point out the wickedness of the crime she had threatened to commit. But her resolution was fixed, and shortly after his departure, she prepared, and took the whole of the poison she had procured. She immediately informed a lady of the family (the same mentioned before as our companion) that she had taken the fatal dose, and now remained in agonizing agony to die in the world. The effect of the poison was immediate. Every exertion was made for her relief, but in vain. She utterly refused all medical aid, and died about five o'clock P.M. after having endured, for several hours, the most excruciating pain. She had her senses to the last, but showed not the least contrition on account of the act she had performed. To those around her she said, "I regret on my account, or soon shall I regret my parents, and enter upon happier scenes." "Alas, poor girl! little did she know that world into which she was about to enter.

The family (mentioned before) were most inconsolable as well as Mr. E. who, a few days previously had executed his will, putting her in possession of five or six thousand dollars; but to this circumstance she paid not the least attention. It is said that various causes occurred to produce in her a state of mind necessary to the performance of the desperate deed. One is, she imagined herself ridiculed and slighted by a young gentleman who had previously engaged her affections, but perhaps other causes had greater effect; her feelings were of a finer kind, and constant reflections upon her lonely and forsaken situation, had wrought her mind to a pitch, rendered almost desperate, by the last coolness or neglect of an acquaintance or friend. She would say, "I had but one relation left to ward off the blow, or blunt the edge of it, and it would have been of no use." Her want of religious education had also left her destitute of a refuge from the troubles and perplexities of a wicked world. Unaccustomed to seek consolation from Him, who alone is able to give it, she knew no rest but in the grave, and made haste to reach her goal.

THE SMOKY WEATHER.
To state a few facts respecting the appearance of smoky weather, will, I believe, be sufficient to refute the notion of its being produced by the smoke of existing fires.

1. This phenomenon happens at all seasons of the year—in the dead of winter, when the earth is covered with snow, as well as at any other time.

2. It appears at sea as well as on land. In 1814, vessels arriving from Europe, reported it many days sail from land.

3. It is extensive, appearing over an extent of many hundred, perhaps thousand miles at the same time.

4. The natural tendency of smoke is upwards, as every one must observe.

5. How impossible is it for the smoke of fires covering a few hundred acres of ground, or even many thousand, to fill such an extent of atmosphere.

If it be asked—what is the cause? I shall answer, that it is a disposition of the air—a state of the atmosphere, produced by its own internal operations, as much as clouds, vapour, different aspects of weather, rain, &c. The particular substance of which it is composed, is constantly, as I conjecture, floating in the higher regions of the atmosphere, and may descend and collect on the surface of the earth from causes existing in the lower, such as a temporary diminution of its elastic and buoyant state. That this substance was originally, and is now, smoke, in different stages of decomposition, is rather probable. It is well known that smoke is very antiseptic. How durable it may be, or what time it may require to decompose, I would not pretend to guess.

Nothing is more groundless than the fears of some people at dark days.
P. S.—Since writing the above, I see it reported that the weather has been as smoky and dark far at sea, as it was on the land.

Synopsis of Miscellaneous Items.

From European Papers.

A London paper mentions that snow had not fallen in England as early as October for 18 years before the present year. It then fell on the same day of the month that it did this year, and the winter following was a remarkable mild one. The foundation of London House, the residence of the Bishop of London, in St. James's square, is now laid, and is to be much more spacious than the late Episcopal mansion.

From the letters and papers seized of the Union Associations, which for some time back have kept Germany in alarm, it would appear that these secret associations were more numerous than generally was apprehended. Their object, it seems was to overthrow the present order of things in Germany. Among the initiated some were called the Absolute or devoted, because they had engaged not to be wined by any consideration from going all lengths required. Sandt, who murdered Kotz bac, was doubtless of this number. Among the documents seized, we have copied a few extracts to show the design which the members of these associations had in view. They follow:—"Is it not to be feared, that in a moment of weakness, or in the agony of death, Sandt may betray his secret?"—"I anxiously study the history of Revolutions, they are necessary to nations as respiration to men."—"At the moment of execution, our friend N. will put himself at our head, and like another Zisca, carry the Bible in one hand and the sword in the other."—"A total overthrow can alone save us."—"The people do not know yet the plan for which Sandt purified himself, but they begin to have a notion of it."—"Let us overthrow the thrones of Alexander, Frederick William, & Francis II."—"To every tree on the road from Berlin to Charlottenburg one of these servants of the throne must hang, and even that will not be sufficient."—"Hereditary monarchy is a foolish institution."—"Is it not so difficult to kill the thirty eight, (meaning the 38 Sovereigns of the German confederation) Sandt must die on the scaffold, that the public may learn to believe in christian charity and resignation, that it may see of what sacrifices the German youth are capable. In this enlightened age the scaffold is the symbol which will replace the Cross."—"Remark this: the present order of things must be changed by the people by force and by terror. Our works will not be tolerated with the nuptial crown; they are reserved for the axe of the executioner."—"To-day the fate of the Jews was put to the vote."—"The associations consist chiefly of young men.

At the London Sessions, Guildhall, lately held by the Lord Mayor, the Recorder, Aldermen, &c. appeared in the robes of mourning in honour of the memory of the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo. Arthur Castlereagh, one of the notorious reformers in Great Britain, has addressed a letter to the people of Manchester, in answer to Hunt's letter, in which he brings a hundred and fifty objections. Allowing one or two to be true, Hunt is unquestionably one of the greatest rascals in the British Empire. B. and W. Watson, a pair of renowned radicals in their letters, also give Hunt a notorious bad character. Hunt no doubt can say as much of Watson's accusers.

MARYLAND GAZETTE.

Annapolis, Thursday, Dec. 9.

A draft upon the national treasury for the sum of one hundred thousand dollars more of the monies advanced during the late war by Maryland, on account of the United States, for the purchase of arms and military stores, was last week received by our treasurer. We feel gratified in noticing this circumstance, not only because it shows that the administrators of the general government are satisfied that this state, as far as her means would permit, faithfully performed her duty during that short but costly conflict, but because it shows the correctness of the course pursued by the federalists, to whose exertions the people of Maryland stand fairly indebted for its recovery; and likewise, because it puts to confusion that clamorous horde who contended that we had no right to ask a reimbursement of expenditures then made, and who, had their course been regarded, would have deprived her of a fair indemnification, though she is entitled to it upon every principle of justice.

Legislature of Maryland.

The House of Delegates formed a quorum on Tuesday. Tobias E. Stansbury, Esq. was chosen Speaker. Mr. John Brewer was appointed clerk and Mr. Peter Webb, assistant clerk. Mr. Cornelius Mills Sergeant at Arms, and Mr. John Quynn Doorkeeper. Messrs. Thomas Spence, Joseph Ireland, Thomas Pollard, John W. Preston, John H. Carroll, were appointed Committee Clerks. The Senate have not yet formed a quorum.

Last evening, on board the United States sloop of war Hornet, lying at the navy yard, a sailor while ascending the main-rigging, to assist in sending down the topgallant yard, from his eagerness to perform his duty, heightened by the pleasing reflection that his time had expired and he would shortly be enabled to meet his relatives and friends—fell from the shrouds, struck his head upon the spars stowed in the chains of the ship, and fell overboard. Mr. Mayo, first lieutenant, saw his perilous situation from the quarter deck, and notwithstanding the severity of the weather, with that genuine spirit of benevolence and humanity which exists only in the hearts of the generous and the brave, plunged into the water to save him—followed by a sailor from the fore-castle. They succeeded in getting him on board; but he was so severely injured he survived but a few moments. It is indeed a pleasing task to record a circumstance so highly commendable in Mr. Mayo—when, forgetting the disparity of rank, and regardless of the coldness of the weather, he saw in him only an unfortunate man and an old shipmate, whose life he would preserve at any risk. By this act he has added another to the many proofs already given of his love for his men and his value as an officer—while such feelings as these exist between the highest officer and meanest seaman, where is the surprise at the subordination in our navy?—
