Accounts have been received from the Greek fleet in the Archipelago, which has made for the Dardan. nelles, and it is asserted has forced the pussage. It is added that the Greeks, after having effected a landing on the European court, took, by assault, and blew up, the new car tle at the entrance of the streight leading into the Archipelago, and also the old castle situated where the Channel is less broad. Weimpatiently expect confirmation of this intelligence, the consequences of which may be decisive of the fire Constantinople, because, at they define not expect the approach of an enemy, it is not likely they have made all defensive preparations, as were defiwhen Admiral Duckworth ender voured to force the passage of the Dardenelles.

(Condensed.)
CHAPTER 24.

Now the long dreary winter of Norway had gone by; the forests rostled their bright preen leaves; friendly tufts of reviving sod and brambles smiled from the height of cliffs, the vallies resumed their ver-nover entered it, yet whenever, during the chace, I saw its spires appear above the tops of the high pines and fire, my bosom always felt heavily opprest, as of a presentiment that something unheard of kept there its residence. A few weeks ago, about duek, while yet the snow lay in these vallies. I inadgertently approached nearer to its walls than usual. Young Sir Sintram walked solitarily to and fro upon its huge onter walls, like the spirit of a doparted hero, and played on the lute; calling forth its most touching mefancholy notes, and frequently sighing, as if the care was wounded by deep irrepatible grief.

The speaker was interrupted by the approach of other servants so that Folko and Gabriela heard not the conclusion of his speech.

But the beautiful lady inclined derself towards her knight, her eye moist with a transparent tear, she observed: "Does not the moon-cliff raisevits desolate head among you mountains? I pity from my innermost heart, the fate of poor Sintram."

"I take thy meaning, oh my pure gentle wife, I know the pious pity of thy tender bosom," replied Folko; and immediately he ordered his steed to be brought him, commended his lady to the protection of his men, vaulted into the saddle, and, accompanied by the grateful looks of Gabriela, he galloped off towards the moon-cliff.

Sintram was sitting on the green turf before the drawbridge, his hand played over the strings of his lute, now and then a tear trickled down upon the golden harmony-he appeared almost exactly as Folko's followers had described him. Suddenly something passed over his head like the shadow of a cloud, and he looked up, believing it to be a flock of cranes returning to its northern home. But he saw nothing; the sky appeared one united, bluel brilliant expander, and while the knight was yet mainly over the strange phenomenon, theredropt from the tip of the high tower which was adorn and with manufold area. ed with manyfold arms, a javelin long and straight, before his feet. A voice whispered into his ear, "Take this and use it well! Nigh is thy enemy! Nigh the disappearance of thy greatest happiness;" and Sintram thought he saw the shade of Minikin gliding by him and vanishing in a cleft of the rugged side of the moat. But at the same time a tall, gigantic, meagre shape strode across the valley; it somewhat re sembled the departed pilgrim, but was vastly taller. It raised the long emaciated arm, menacing in dreadful attitude, and then disappeared.

It was just then Folko came up the path leading towards Sintram. He had probably seen something of the wonderful appearances, and when he stopped close behind the young man, he looked rather pale, and asked,

"Who were these two. you held converse with even now?" "That God only knows;" replied

Sintram, I know them not." "Oh that God but knew it!" exclaimed the Baron; "but I fear he knows but little of your present thoughts and doing."

"You speak harsh, hard words, said Sintram; but since the dreadful evening of the bear chace, I must submit to ought you may impose. But, dear Sir, you may confidently believe me: I know not my dreadful companions, I call them not, nor do I know what horrid curse fetters them to my heels. Oh, let me still hope that God has not forgotten me, as a good shepherd will not neglect the worst, the wildest lamb of his flock, that has gone astray from the rest, and now calls for help can the wilderness."

Folkn's langer was gone. Two bright, tears glittered in his eyes and he said: "No, verily, God has not forgotten thee, oh do but thou not cliffs, the vallies resumed their verdure, the brooks babbled anew, on the highest mountain pasks only there remained yet the hermines snow, and ready for the voyage rocked Folks and Gabriela's vessel at the resplendent wave.

The Baron now perfectly resovered to health, feeling strong and accurate the constitution and the highest mountain pasks only the Lord protect thee, may the Lord expense of the voyage in the resplendent wave.

Pool fool, threefold fool while pared Minikin's enraged voice into Sintram's ear, but old Rolf was heard from the castle singing his morning hymo; the concluding stan-sa of which was as follows! Thro death and woe Thy path milego With waremiss; But never turn

And thou shalt earn Of heaven, the highest bliss. And Sintram felt pure joy in his heart, and looked round him even with greater satisfaction, than 'at the hour when Gabriela had given him the scarf and sword, and Folko had dubbed him'a knight. TTo be cominued ]

Tuesday, Sept. 13.

The Electors met.

The committee of elections made a re port, on the second reading of which Mr. Lecompte offered an amendment with respect to the election in Anne-Arunde county, stating the fact, that there did not appear, upon the face of the returns, to be any re urn of the votes received in the sixth election district of said county, as is required by the law of 1816, and made a part f the constitution in 1817. Amendment negatived.

Mr. Lecomple also offered an amendment to the report with respect to the election in the city of Annapolis, denying the right the city of Annapolis, denying the right of said city to choose an elector, inasmuch as she had been deprived of it by the law of 1836, ch. 252, and made a part of the constitution by the law of 1817, ch. 149 Amendment rejected—yeas 11, nays 22.

Having made the nominations the Elec-tors proceeded to balloa for a Senate. The result was as follows. WESTERN SHORE.
