And be it enacted, That it shall be the duty of the inspectors aforesaid, when required by the owner or his agent to draw duplicate samples, so to do, and to stamp the samples so drawn, according to the provisions of this act, the owner or his agent first agreeing to pay him the sum aforesaid for every duplicate sample thus furnished.

From the American Farmer. CABBAGE PLANTS.—HOW BEST RAISED.

A very erroneous practice has long prevailed with respect to the method of propagating cabbage plants; and although I may laugh at it as experienced gardeners, or I may profess to be a nice gardener, still I venture to suggest a mode which I believe all will approve of after trying it. The common practice has been to sow cabbage seeds on very rich ground, in order to have early plants, and many estimate the due of their plants, or transplanting, in proportion to their large size—but I do not. If you sow your seeds early, on very rich ground, they progress rapidly; and it soon becomes a small stem, and small top—If it is sown thin, they will be too large to transplant before the proper time, for a winter crop.

If you sow your seeds late in the spring, you cannot be certain of succeeding. The plants, as soon as they appear above ground, are frequently destroyed by a small black fly, especially if the weather proves dry, and it is difficult to preserve them. I have used many remedies without success. Some years ago, after I had sown a large lot of cabbage seeds early in the spring, I determined to procure a variety, and from seed stores I was furnished with eight or ten different sorts—they did not come to me as soon as I expected, and I believe they were sown about the first of May, on rich ground; the season proved dry, and soon as they appeared above ground, they were destroyed by the flea. I entirely neglected them, and was obliged to have recourse to my bed sown early in the season.

Instead of sowing my cabbage seeds on rich ground, I have for several years past sown the poorest part of my garden, and sown my seeds early in the spring as the best would admit. The continual moisture of the spring will soon cause cabbage seeds to vegetate and grow on poor ground, and they do not often injure them when transplanted. If any are wanted for early planting, they can be forced for springing a part of the best soil from around the manure heap; and a portion of the plants can be thus forced all through the season, so as to have them of proper size at any time. Those on the poor ground not manured soon acquired a dwarfish appearance, and will remain so all the season, unless watered or manured as directed, or transplanted to rich ground, when they will flourish as if sown in the best soil.

I do not prefer to transplant large plants, or small plants do not usually fall so much as large ones. I shall hereafter try this method, and I ask others to try it, before they condemn the practice.

FODDER. From the Boston Palladium. A tract of a letter on the subject of sowing Indian Corn for Fodder. "I have found the advantages of sowing Indian Corn for fodder so many, that I hope it will be brought into general use.—The quantity which can be produced on an acre, when compared to any other fodder, is immense, and the quality, (if cut in proper season, and well spread,) is superior to the best of any other. The manner in which I proceed, is to sow the land as usual for corn, and at the same time to sow it off into rows a foot wide, and two and a half feet distant from each other, so as to admit small horse plough between the rows—sow the manure in the furrows, and then sow Southern Corn on the manure, so that the seed may be about six or seven inches apart, and cover them, the same depth as when sown planted. Southern corn will produce much greater quantity than northern corn.

When the corn is about eight or ten inches high, it will be proper to pass a horse plough up and down between each row, to pull up all the large weeds, and cover the soil. It is important that this ploughing and weeding should be done faithfully. About the middle of July it will be fit to cut it, and before it spindles; for if it is not cut, it exhausts the land unnecessarily, and the stalk grows hard and tough, and loses its nutritive quality, consequently becomes unfit for use. Care should be taken not to cut it too near the ground, it will sprout again, and in September you will have another crop. The value of this kind of fodder, more than any other, depends on the success of curing it, as rain dew injures it extremely. If possible, it should be carried where it could be placed to cover during a shower, or thrown on stacks, and as soon as it is sufficiently winter used, when cattle or horses will feed on it, it should be immediately covered. In consequence of long spring drought, it should be approached that your crop of corn will fall short of the ordinary quantity to support your cattle through the summer winter, you can "break up" a piece of land, even as late as June, sow it with corn as above described, and it will produce an excellent fodder for the year. If your pastures have been withered, and afford little food, which often occurs in July and August, you can provide for the spring, by appropriating the spring, a portion of land for the cultivation of this
