PHENOMENON. A circumstance happened a week is yes erday, in the neighbourhood of the of of Hudson, New-York, which has exceed a very general attention, and I have of served, a great deal of idle & odd speculation On Monday morning, the 22d, inst was observed there had been a sudden ar unaccountable rise in the Claverack creek at the bridge on the Columbia turnpike, a bont two miles east of this city; and, on tracing its course downward, it was found to be occasioned by an entire stoppage of ow; which had set back the stream, till banks would confine it no longer, and then it was overflowing in the meadow adjacent

About 30 or 40 yards from the left or west bank of the creek, a spot of ground, of neary an acre in extent, had sunk precipitate ly down-leaving a perpendicular bank where it had broken off, about eighteen of twenty feet high. The sunken ground, however, did not extend to the bank of the creek, which was left, or about 20 yards On this side the land, where it parted, did not settle so low as the other; the nake of the ground originally giving a cor siderable descent towards the east.

ire bed of the creek, for about an hundred yards in length, had been raised directly ip, so as to lorce the current over the right bank, into the meadow on the east.

The water has since been gradually were ing away the earth that was so raised, and has now formed a narrow channel in its for-

The ground which fell in, in the manne The ground which fell in, in the manner have described, was composed of a rich lam, somewhat sandy, which apparently extends to a considerable depth. Below this, there is probably a stratum of clay, as the bed or the creek consists of this substance overlaid with about eight inches of cravel and nebbles. These were covered gravel and pebbles. These were covered in spots, with the weed known by the name of eet grass; and exhibited here and there, large number of fresh water clams, & fish, that had been left by the receding waters.

The elevation of the bed of the creek was nearly the same for the hundred yards it extended and would average ten feet. 04 walking over it, I could observe no indictions from the banks, or any where else, of what might be considered the immediate cause of its sudden and extraordinary rise.

I was told that the water had always been considerably deeper here than at any other point, for some distance above or below.

I have endeavoured to give as brief and plain a description of this singular appearance as I could; and if it can be rationally and satisfactorily accounted for, I am curi-

It has been suggested, that beneath the stratum of clay—(the depth of which has not been ascertained)—there was a bed of quick sand, which was forced by the weight of the superincumbent earth, under the bed of the creek—which being much lower, and consequently lighter, yielded to the pressure of the heavier mass that sunk. But then, how does it happen that the intermediate space between the spot from whence it was removed and that where it is now deposited, is not at all disturbed? or why should it cause the bed of the creek to rise only feet, when it made way for a much larger tract to settle nearly twenty?

Again, it is said that the earth had been gradually undermined and washed away by small springs and struams. But if this had been the case, there would be some evidence of the feet, was should shink, in the deposits of the fact, we should think, in the deposits of sand or clay; but so far from this, none can be seen, and every appearance seems to indicate the contrary.—Northern Whig.

We have a detained account in last Saturday, Mineva, of most of the discoveries said to have been made of that extraordinary Marinoanimal, called the Mermaid, and which we think renders its existence no way improbable. The following article, which we copy from the Boston Evening Gazette of Monday, decidedly corroborates the statement to which we have just referred.

A MERMAID. An American shipmaster from this port, became thefortunate purchaser, some months ago, in the Island of Java, of a preserved Mermand, which had been brought to Ba-Japan lales. The Fish had become perfect-ly dry, and was originally, it is thought, about four feet in length From a gentleman who lately saw the specimen, we learn that the descriptions giving in old books of natural history and the representations fre quently seen in old drawings of the Mer naid, are fully confirmed by the appearance of this rare and perhaps unexampled preparation. The head is covered with light coloured hair, coarser than human hair. The upper part of the face resembles a man's but the lower part approaches a monkey's The nose is flat like that of an African gro. From the upper jaw of a very wide mouth, descend two tusks passing over the lower lip; but the rest on both jaws are ve led from the dissicated state of the skin, and The shape of the bust is precisely like the configuration of a woman, below which the body gradually becomes scaly, and tapering by degrees, terminates in a fishes' tail. There are four fins on the lower part of the body, and the extremity of the tail is fork

This curiosity was exhibited at the Cape of Good Hope, and submitted to the inspection of several naturalists from England; who entirely concurred in the opinion that this is an example of the Mermaid, whose existence has been generally held to be fabulous. The owner is proceeding to Europe and we may soon expect to hear of its arrival in England.
