THE LAST SONG.

From the New York Statesman. Strike the wild harp yet once again!
Again its lonely numbers pour;
Then let the melancholy strain Be finshed in death for evermorel For vermore Lor evermore, Creative laney, be thou still, And let oblivion's Lethe pour Upon my lyre its waters chill,

Strike the wild harp yet once again! Then be its fitful cords unsaturing Silent, as the grave domain—
And mute, as the death mouldered tongue.
Let not a thought of inemory dwell
One moment on its former song—

Forgotten, too, he this farewell. Which plays its pensive strings along. Strike the wild harp yet once again!
The audiest and the latest lay—
Then break at once its strings in twain—
And they shall sound no more for aye; And hang it on the cypress tree-Whe mours of youth and song have past,
Have gone with all their witchery— Lost lyrel these numbers are thy LAST!

WEALTH.

How much is wealth thought of and desired by the generality of mankinds but what is it? Can it insure happiness? Can it keep off pain? Can it remove anxiety? Are keep off pain? Can it remove anxiety? Are the richest always the happiest? Have they me there in their pillow? Are they atrangers to solicitude? Have they no wants? How eiten do anxiety and care, ambition and ensy, arise in proportion to the abundance of wealth men pouses?—What a snare has, it often proved—How many on their dying, beds may kruly say; "This mealth has killed men had I pousessed less, is appuld not have fallen a viction to the many on their dying, he would not have been so exposed to the world, but here alwest fall my mined and undone, by the street lessings which should have rendered very blessings which should have repleted me more thankful to God, and useful to my fellow creatures XVIII
