ance, was unwilling in his attention to the health of his wife, every day which science and wealth could procure was called in to attempt her restoration or at least to prolong her existence. But every effort that intended to stop her decline, seemed ineffectual, day by day her constitution gave way before the slow but certain ravages of her disease, and she at length expired August 10, you could trace no resemblance in the deadly pale, emaciated and trembling countenance of Heronville.

The wretched cry of the French resounded now once more over her gallant soil, he had broken the shackles that were his fetters him he soared, and with renovated spirit he stepped from the tomb of the fallen hero. "Could a Frenchman hear that call so dear to his heart, he hasten to the standard of glory that waved once more over the insulted fields of his country. Dead every man is the home of social affection and strong the ties that bind him to those who there call him by the endearing name of son or father or husband, but dearer to every Frenchman is the honour of his country, and stronger the bands which unite him to her destiny. D'Hernouville, amid a host of every other considerations flew to meet his Emperor, he shared with him in the glory of the triumphal march from St. Jean to the Imperial palace of Paris, he shared with him the dangers of Waterloo and the second disgrace of the French name.

But the ultimate fall of Napoleon and the return of the ancient dynasty had the worst of consequences for d'Hernouville. His possessions were sequestered, his wife driven to seek refuge with a uncle whose more pious political creed had secured him in his possessions, and d'Hernouville himself was thrown into a dungeon, where he languered away a whole year, he was released, but after a mock trial, he was sentenced to a life of banishment, broken hearted and totally ruined in health and fortune. Their second reunion was indeed like the meeting of beings risen from the deep sleep of the grave to enjoy for one moment the melancholy aspect of each other's decay and then to sink again into the deep vault of corruption whence they came. The strength of their affection however had survived the wreck of their bodies, and persecuted by the world, expelled from the enjoyment of any of its meretricious charms, they turned their views to that other existence, that brighter life which promises to crown with eternal glory the sufferings of the mortal clay.

The old clergyman who during Augustus's captivity had been her tutor and friend, had not forsaken her in the gloomy hour of desolation. His pious and knowledge administered balm to the sufferings of these two most wretched beings, while their mutual and ceaseless efforts at the alleviation of each other's distresses seemed to heighten the love they had borne each other almost from their infancy. Every heart was moved to behold their looks of deep affection dwell upon each other with all the anxiety that wished to search out more view of the beloved object, he was without her, she was without him, how often did they not sink down together before the altar of the virgin that adorned their chamber and transformed into a temple, and you could distinctly trace in their expressive countenances, or overhear in their low and fervent whispers the wish, that the same moment would end their sufferings and bear their souls to heaven. His wish was not granted them, d'Hernouville expired upon the bosom of his wife, at the very moment he ran to her assistance in a fit of convulsive coughing that threatened her with immediate death.

The violent attack which seemed to menace Augustus's life proved beneficial, it caused the removal of an abscess which had been formed on her lungs for years, and the disconsolate widow was restored to life and health. Shall I now stop, shall I lay down my pen and suffer you to imagine her distress and grief at her irreparable loss? No—truth demands the sacrifice, I must continue my tale. The powerful aid of her uncle restored her to the ample possessions of her husband; six months after the death of d'Hernouville she took possession of his estate and celebrated her marriage with Baron O'Loughan, major in his Britannic Majesty's—regiment of Irish Dragoons.

PRESIDENTIAL. The war begins to wax warm, and a few short weeks will decide the contest—let us examine how the respective candidates stand. In Massachusetts, the strong hold of Mr. Adams, he is evidently in danger—an opposition, formidable in numbers and influence, is organized and efficiently at work. A democratic, unpledged electoral ticket is formed in that state, of some of the best and oldest citizens, and an address issued distinguishing the talents and patriotic feelings of the candidates. The prospects of Mr. Adams in New England are gloomy; the old democratic party is moving in great strength. A writer in the Boston Daily Advertiser, after seriously examining the pretensions of Mr. Adams, says: "It is now settled, beyond all dispute, that if Mr. Adams is chosen President, this country, which ought to be the happiest that the sun shines upon, must be torn by factions. Instead of using his talents to promote the peace and prosperity of interior, and to maintain honour, and independence in all exterior relations, he must busy himself in satisfying the demands of his rapacious adherents; he must use his public trust, to compensate individual partisans. If he refuses to do this, he must quarrel with his own supporters; and having brought this to pass, he disturbs, and compromises distinction, will end with his first four years."

The Eastern Argus, published in Portland, one of the best informed papers in that section of the country, says, that it is a great error in putting down the 51 votes of New-England for Mr. Adams: He will not obtain them. The Argus says Mr. Crawford will certainly obtain the votes in the Portland district in New-Hampshire, seven of the Adams' electors have declared by their votes that they are unpledged; this proves that they have no confidence in the success of Mr. Adams in Rhode Island will assuredly vote for Mr. Crawford. Mr. Adams will be seriously opposed in Vermont. Every thing in Connecticut wears a promising aspect; the best informed men in that state are confident in their opinions relative to the final vote. From all that we can learn, and from an unprejudiced view of things, we feel assured that if we set down 45 votes in all New-England for Mr. Crawford, we calculate at a low standard, and if Mr. Adams is deprived of 15 votes he cannot be returned to the House of Representatives.

Parallels between Mr. Crawford and Mr. Adams.

A writer in the Eastern Star, painted at Mechanics, draws the following parallel between Mr. Crawford and Mr. Adams. Mr. Crawford was born without fortune, & by the force of his own native powers of mind has attained to some of the highest stations in the government. Mr. Adams was born to fortune, and brought up under the care of a father who possessed political influence, and whose name more than any thing else, has aided the advancement of his son in political life.

He was educated among his countrymen, and in intimate acquaintance with the habits and pursuits of the people of his country, and as one who has drunk in his knowledge from the pure fountains of republican institutions. He has not been corrupted by his principles, by a residence of twenty years in foreign courts, where republican principles are held in abhorrence. Since the first commencement of his political career he has been an unflinching republican, and has never sacrificed his principles to personal views, and has uniformly supported those measures of government, which have advanced this country to its present exalted and prosperous situation.

In every state he has occupied, he has acted the part of an upright and independent public servant, and has in no instance, compromised the interests of the nation. While a member of the Ghent commission, he proposed to give up the right of navigating the Mississippi, to the English, for the right of fishing on the coast of Labrador. And in a late convention with the British government, he conceded the right of Search to the British Government, where by our vessels would have been liable to interruption in our very harbours.

Mr. Adams is generally supported by the friends of the nation. He has neither the confidence of his former federal friends, nor that of the republican party. His political tergiversations have lost him the warm esteem of most of the eminent men of the nation.

He has repelled assault with acrimony and temper, and when he could not vanquish by argument, he has evinced a dauntless spirit by appeals to popular prejudices—as in his "Appendix."

He has descended to the mean expedient, in order to aid his own election, not only to abet the cause of Ninian Edwards, but also to write in the columns of a newspaper expressly got up to aid his election.

He is an able financier, and the prosperous state of the moneyed concerns of the nation is chiefly owing to his good management, wise precautions and economical measures. To these facts not only the present state of the treasury give unequivocal evidence, but the most experienced politicians of the nation concur in their testimony to the truth of them. He is a practical politician, and has been long connected with the administration than Mr. Adams.

He has never taken any pains to advance his own cause, but has left it to the good sense of the people, without resorting, in any measure, to any measure, by which he might acquire popularity. Instead of patronizing a newspaper to support his election, he has deprived the Washington Gazette of the privilege of publishing the Documents of his department, although it is friendly to his election, because it discovered something like antipathy to Mr. Monroe. Mr. Crawford writes in no newspaper to advance himself to the Presidency.

Mr. Crawford is a man of calm feelings, totally destitute of irascibility—kind in his disposition, willing to forgive injuries, but firm in his purposes.

Mr. Adams is passionate—irritable, hasty and self-willed—never forgetting or forgiving an injury.

PHILOPOTEMON. Captain Page, of the ship Canton, at New York, touched off the blockade of that port was continued by Lord Cochrane's squadron. He was informed by the British sloop of war Tweed, that several American vessels were in that port and were not allowed to come out. On the 8th of September, he was hoarded by an officer of one of the fleet, who stated that Lord Cochrane had left there a few days before, on a cruise for a few days to the Southward.

OBITUARY.

In this county, on Thursday night last, Mrs. MARGARET HUNTER, consort of Mr. John Hunter. In this city on Monday last, Mr. JAMES DULCHER, in the 33d year of his age. He was an inoffensive man.

COMMUNICATED. Died, at his residence near Nottingham, Prince George's county, State of Maryland, the 30th September last, Mr. JOHN BADER, senior, aged 71 years 9 months and 10 days, leaving an only son, and a number of grand children and great grand children to deplore his loss. Mr. Bader was the eldest and one of the most respectable inhabitants of the neighbourhood in which he lived. For nearly a century he had enjoyed the confidence, respect, and good opinion of all who knew him, and notwithstanding his extreme old age, he continued to the last, to be useful to his family and his friends. He was remarkable for the regularity of his habits and a strict observance of all the Christian duties. A life so well spent cannot fail to comfort his numerous relatives and produce a salutary example in his neighbourhood.

POSTSCRIPT

CONFIRMATION of the DEATH OF THE KING OF FRANCE.

The ship Martha, at New York from Havre, brings a confirmation of the DEATH OF LOUIS 18th. All business was suspended at Havre in consequence of this event.

LA FAYETTE'S ARRIVAL AT YORK-TOWN.

By the steambost Virginia we learn that the General was landed at Yorktown on Monday about noon, amidst an immense concourse of gratified spectators. A national salute was fired on the occasion, and the whole scene was one of the most grand and imposing ever witnessed in Virginia. A letter from the editors of a gentleman of Baltimore who was present, states that the General landed at a quarter before two o'clock, P. M. in an eight oared barge, accompanied by Chief Justice Marshall, and other distinguished characters. He was received by the Governor of Virginia and the Council of State. After the General's reply to the Governor's Address, he attended a superb barouche drawn by four elegant greys with postillions in full livery with him were seated the Governor of Virginia the Chief Justice of the United States, and the Secretary of War. In other carriages followed the General's family, revolutionary officers, and others, and the procession was closed by an immense concourse of citizens. The whole proceeded to the General's quarters, where he was received by Major General R. B. Taylor and staff, with a host of officers attached to the various Virginia corps. On the 19th (Tuesday) there was to be a grand review. On the plain of York a splendid arch is erected—and two handsome obelisks mark the two celebrated points of attack during the siege. The number of persons assembled at York was estimated at about six thousand.—Am.

From Thompson's Island.

A letter from a gentleman at Thompson's Island to his friend at Norfolk, dated the 21st ult. says: "The fever broke out here about 10 days since with great malignity.—Dr. John D. Armstrong, of the U. S. Navy, died yesterday. The U. S. Sch. Wild Cat sailed from Havre for this place about 22 days ago—nothing has been heard of her since."

BAHAMA ISLANDS.

Nassau papers to the 7th instant, received at Charleston, furnish the details of disasters experienced by the late equinoctial gales. In the harbour of Nassau and throughout all the Islands, a number of small craft were driven ashore, and the trees in the vicinity of the town much injured.
